In the 1993 album Colin James and The Little Big Band marked the beginning of a musical experiment called The Little Big Band. The album was met with critical acclaim but was a tough sell back then. After all, the movie "Swingers" was several years away and kids still looked to Kurt Cobain for fashion advice. But today things are different and swing is the new hot item. Bands like Big Bad Voodoo Daddy and the Brian Setzer Orchestra are enjoying so much deserved success and James' new album Colin James and the Little Big Band II is a smash hit in Canada, reaching gold in just three weeks.

"I could kinda see it coming," commented James in an interview with The Queen's Journal. "It's been all over the fashion of L.A. for the past two years, but I never thought it would be this big," he said.

Though currently riding the wave of swing success, James never thought of jumping on the big bandwagon. "It was a project that began 3 years ago for me when I decided to reform The Little Big Band" reflected James.

Flanked by a number of talented musicians, including sax-player Greg Piccolo and the producing talents of Joe Hardy, James set out to make one of his finest albums ever, featuring 12 remakes of thirties and forties classic swing songs and two originals in the Cab Calloway tradition. James predicts Wednesday's show to resemble "just a stage full of guys up there to fun."

As for the future of Colin James, look for a Christmas special with the Rankin Family, a follow-up swing album, and a contemporary album of originals James describes as "Funky Hendrix meets Kravitz." James was very excited considering his upcoming projects and has not become complacent considering his success as an ever-changing musician. "No matter what I do in music, it's all blues to me," said James.

So be prepared Kingston; leave your pork-pie hat on the rack and show up Wednesday with a swing in your step.

Ballet Flamenco Arte De Espana heats up Queen's tower

DANCE REVIEW

Ballet Flamenco Arte De Espana Grant Hall

By JENNIFER MUIR

When I was told I was going to a ballet, images of Swan Lake emerged in my head. Thus, my uncultured mind received quite a shock when I arrived at Grant Hall on Friday night to the upbeat, energetic guitar rhythms of flamenco. The Ballet Flamenco Arte De Espana was far from the childhood recitals of my past.

The program opened with a haunting guitar solo by Marcos Marin. The talented Marin seemed to take the audience through a whole sequence of events — from a gentle romance to a loud battle with a dramatic conclusion — in his musical prelude.

The first dance section, called the Demencia Flamenco, was the romantic tale of Don Quixote, played by a chivalrous Bobby Thompson, who goes mad from reading novels of Knighthood. In his demented state, he imagines a romance with a beautiful lady, Dulcinea, gracefully portrayed by Lina Moros, and engages in exciting battles with his faithful mare (Elyse Filteau).

The dance involving all five performers combined elements from the entire performance, embracing the spirit of flamenco.

Throughout most of the Demencia Flamenco, there was no more than two dancers on the stage at the same time, yet the combination of sharp dance steps, guitar music and precise hand clapping made it seem as though there were twenty. Both dance sequences with Thompson and Moros were superbly executed — the synchronization between each pair was impeccable and very effective.

PLAY REVIEW

Aunt Dan and Lemon
Baby Grand
Running until October 25

By HEATHER MAC DONALD

For the next two weeks, Kingston will be witness to sexuality, brutality and the fragile human psyche. Aunt Dan and Lemon, a play by Wallace Shawn, is in the middle of a seventeen night run at the Baby Grand Theatre. Directed by Craig Walker, this somewhat abstract piece is set in London, England in the year 1985.

The cast is composed of only seven actors playing twelve roles in total; an equation which is computed in a creative and elegant manner. Small costume changes, or voice mannerisms were used to denote the introduction of a new character. As well, the performances of the actors were further complicated considering the characters were comprised of American and British personas.

During her opening and closing monologues Lemon discusses the theme of ordinary personal existence in relation to the actions of the Nazi's in the Second World War. Lemon feels that their actions are simply devoid of compassion, developing to a lesser extent the idea that this trait is common in all people. Though this approach is problematic to some, it was quite fascinating to contemplate. Walker himself, in his notes, admits to the audience that his whole motivation for doing the play was to examine the adverse view of the distorted human psyche.

The two leading characters in the play, Aunt Dan and Lemon, were played by Karen Skidmore and Michelle Mallen respectively. The characters play off each other. Lemon is a rather troubled youth who revels in the stories that her Aunt shares with her.

The two share a bond of isolation from the world, both living through the vivid happenings of Dan's past. The play generally consists of Lemon watching Dan's life unfold through a form of pictorial narration, climaxing with a sexually explicit scene of unexpected brutality. Though Lemon is but a girl while first hearing of these stories, she is sharing them with the audience as a woman of 30 odd years.

However, this approach leads to a lack of accessibility to an average audience. For example, in order to completely understand one thematic aspect, an audience must be familiar with mid-sixties British-American politics and, more specifically, Henry Kissinger. Aunt Dan is fascinated with Kissinger's actions and opposes all who feel differently. A large portion of the play deals with a debate over the morality of his actions.

Though the general plot of the play is ambiguous, it still leaves me in a pensive state over its controversial content. An enjoyable, although complicated, night of thought awaits all who embark in the journey through memory and imagination that makes up Aunt Dan and Lemon.

RESTAURANT REVIEW

Chez Piggy
68-R Princess St.

By AARON WEST

By reputation, it has been argued that Chez Piggy stands alone at the top of the upscale dining experience in Kingston. Does the restaurant live up to this impressive reputation? By considering food quality, service, and atmosphere, Sunday night afforded me the opportunity to assess Chez Piggy in terms of its overall dining experience.

After being seated by our host, presented with menus, and having our drink orders taken, our server introduced himself and in customary fashion informed us of the day's specials. The one page, double-sided menu listed a variety of appetizer and entrée selections with a price range that peaked at $23.00.

The wine list, which was several pages long, offered many different selections representing various origins of import, and with such a large price differential that it appeared to be very well rounded.

For an appetizer we ordered, on the recommendation of our server, the Mussels Piri Piri (seasoned with Portuguese oil). The generous portion of shelled mussels presented to us was light in flavour with a subtle hint of white wine. After washing this down with an "Iced Laced and Whipped" espresso ($5.50), whose ingredients included Bailey's and Grand Marnier, we were ready to look back to our menus and decide on a main course.

Describing the experience of the perfect steak as melting in one's mouth is as close as I can get to accurately relaying my feelings on the meat.

Upon my asking his feelings on the rack of lamb, our server described the entrée as being of an insufficient portion to adequately "fill someone of (mine) or (his) size if they were hungry".

With this recommendation the full Rib Steak as a heartier alternative, and I acquiesced to his reasoning. He then went on to describe the twenty day aging process that the cut would have undergone before its preparation, with an additional two or three days for marinating. Having won my confidence in the order at that point, I selected a glass of Capelands Merlot ($5.95) from their list of red house wines.

Upon its arrival, I found my entrée selection to be appropriately cooked to my specifications. Prepared with garlic, peppercorns, and oil, the ample cut was served in a pleasing presentation with boiled potatoes and a mix of vegetables. Toni Morrison's novel hits the big screen and the audiences

Soap Oprah: Daytime Queen Oprah Winfrey and Danny Glover share their passions on screen.

FILM REVIEW

Beloved
Famous Players Capitol Theatres
Starring Oprah Winfrey, Danny Glover, Thandie Newton

By STU TALOS

Based on the Pulitzer Prize winning novel by Toni Morrison, the film adaptation, Beloved, directed by Jonathan Demme (Silence of the Lambs, Philadelphia) and starring Danny Glover, Thandie Newton, and Oprah Winfrey, is an emotional and effective saga of slavery in the 19th century United States.

The film's central character Sethe (Oprah Winfrey), is a runaway slave who is haunted by the ghost of her infant daughter Beloved. This epic is not just about slavery, it's also a love story between a mother and a daughter, and the undying loyalty that forces her to do anything to protect her baby. Beloved is a story about devotion, building on the past, and about the hope needed to move forward.

Surprising cuts, sequences in drained colour, and a mobile camera — all of which enhance the realism and the tortured legacy of slavery.

Visually, the film stirs the senses, using a variety of techniques — surprising cuts, sequences in drained colour, and a mobile camera — all of which enhance the realism and the tortured legacy of slavery.

The opening scene is pure chaos, startling viewers, and establishing the dark haunting atmosphere that shadows the entire film. This initial disorder is in fact caused by the ghost of a child, whose emotions dictate the film's tone and flow.

As the story progresses, however, it settles into a comfortable yet assertive rhythm. The thematic weight is gradually incorporated, only after Demme establishes the key characters and motives. Considering that the story spends most of its time in one ramshackle wooden house, and runs almost three hours in length, it is surprising that Beloved remains engrossing as a slave epic and a chilling ghost story.

The story starts off in 1873, after the U.S. Civil War. Sethe (Winfrey) is a middle-aged former slave, living near Cincinnati with her socially isolated teen-aged daughter, Denver, and the ghost of her dead daughter. Her adolescent sons, who no longer can cope living with a ghost, abandon Sethe. Paul D. (Danny Glover), a friend from Sethe's former plantation years, shows up unexpectedly soon after her sons depart. They become physically and emotionally involved, and bring short-term stability to the distraught household.

Soon after, a young woman who calls herself Beloved, dressed in black and covered with insects, is found on the front yard. Leaning against a stump, she looks like a weather beaten scarecrow, with demonic garble drooling out her snarling mouth. The family passionately takes her in, much to the discomfort of Paul D.

This new member of the house, however, becomes entangled in an increasingly symbolic relationship with the others. This emotionally disturbing circumstance, interweaved with powerful flashbacks of pre-Emancipation terrors, inspire a series of personal revelations for Sethe throughout the film.

The performances that fuel and give the story its genuine emotional depth are worthy of attention. Danny Glover's portrayal of Paul D. is strong, while the celebrity status of Oprah Winfrey disappears in her portrayal of Sethe, accompanied by a soulful intensity that one does not expect possible from personality of her iconic magnitude.

It is a balance of talented performances, brilliant direction and captivating mood manipulation that not only does justice to but also heightens a story of epic proportions making it accessible to all audiences.

lighting, designed by Lou Artea, made the dancers seem larger than life — they owned the stage, and invited the audience in for their story.

Despite the fact that the dialogue was sung in Spanish, the expressive body language used by Thompson, Moros, and Filteau made the plot easy to follow. The lighting and tempo of the music also helped dictate the mood of the characters. The lighting was soft and subtle, and the music was melodious when the characters were in despair. In contrast, the lights turned brilliant red and orange and the music sped up at the moments of climax.

One of the brightest and most exhilarating events was the arrival of the Windmills (played by Daniela, Moros, and Maria Parisella) at the end of Demencia Flamenco, when Don Quixote and his mare Rocinante are surrounded by the girls in a hard scene.

The second dance act, called Cuadro Flamenco, showcased the performers individually. In this section, the audience was exposed to a multitude of flamenco stylings, from the staccato beats of flawless footwork to the snappy accompaniment of the palmas. Each member of the company had a chance to shine during this section, which lasted about an hour. As an interlude between the dancers, there was another guitar solo, this time performed by Caroline Plante. Plante's harmonious music stood out as a heartfelt compliment to the flamboyance of the flamenco style of dance.

The audience was exposed to a multitude of flamenco stylings, from the staccato beats of flawless footwork to the snappy accompaniment of the palmas.

The finale was a dance called the Cana, and the company did a good job of working up to this point. The well-choreographed and synchronized dance involving all five performers combined elements from the entire performance, embracing the spirit of flamenco.

The dancers' attitudes and emotions came shining through in well choreographed, musically interesting and intriguing performance.

All in all, the evening of flamenco-charged ballet allowed us all to have a taste of Spain, if only for a few hours.

accurately relaying my feelings on the meat. It was a thoroughly enjoyable main course that did prove to be hearty, but left just enough room for dessert. The Apple Berry Crumble ($5) in a brandy cream sauce proved a satisfying compliment to a wonderful meal.

Our service was courteous, knowledgeable, and attentive; without having that in-your-face quality which might suggest a lack of confidence at a lesser establishment. Although, an initial sense of condescending pretension on the part of our server was noted, it was overshadowed by his otherwise professional attention to our table.

Complete with progressively dimmed lighting, comfortable furnishing and appropriate background music (e.g. Miles Davis!), the atmosphere at Chez Piggy encouraged a relaxing dining environment, conducive for good conversation and meal enjoyment.

Does Chez Piggy live up to its reputation as the best restaurant of its kind in Kingston? I can confidently recommend Chez Piggy as a highly enjoyable dining experience for the quality of its food, the professionalism of its service, and the relaxing atmosphere it offers to its patrons.

BIG DECISIONS

"You can only have one of the sides, so is it gonna be her or is it gonna be me?"
—Prado Akhdal

IN LIFE, WE ARE ALL FACED WITH decisions that are both extremely complex and necessary. Some agonize over them, able to make a choice only after thoroughly measuring out each pro and con. Others are content to go for and stick with an initial fancy-tickler. Many of these decisions affect our lives in indirect and virtually unforeseeable ways. Something as seemingly simple as your choice of breakfast cereal carries with it an untold number of physiological and psychological impacts. As a quick example, we might consider the potential benefit of choosing Corn Pops, with the subconsciously pleasing spherical shape of its bits, versus Life cereal, with the jagged, subconsciously agitating edges of its bits (psychological a d v a n t a g e). Measure this against the nutritional superiority of the latter (physiological advantage), and we have a potential stalemate. Unfortunately, in situations of greater importance than the breakfast enigma, a decision must be made.

This brings us to the topic at hand, namely: important and potentially difficult decisions many of us have faced in the past or are likely to face at some point in our future. Specifically, decisions where one is forced to choose between one thing and another. I'm not going to attempt to analyze the following problems and draw conclusions for you, kind reader, because I don't think it's my place (besides, I mix Corn Pops and Life in the same bowl, if you catch my drift, so I'm not the best judge of these things). Rather, in order to provide a more or less representative perspective of the Queen's student body, one hundred Queen's students from various years and faculties were surveyed and their responses tallied. The results are very telling.

Eng program saved

BY SHAWN BRIMLEY

The department of material and metallurgical engineering was given new life yesterday, as Dean of Applied Science Tom Harris facilitated the creation of a materials option in the mechanical engineering department.

"I am very satisfied and pleased with all that the two departments have done together to resolve these issues."

— Principal Bill Leggett

Decreasing enrolment and and fear of losing accreditation prompted Harris and the Faculty of Applied Science to examine the viability of continuing the materials department as a separate department, earlier this year. During last month's Senate meeting, Principal Bill Leggett said, "It is of my opinion that chronic under-enrolment in materials and metallurgical engineering makes it impossible for the Faculty of Applied Science to sustain the continued academic viability of the undergraduate program."

A departmental meeting for mechanical engineering on October 20 facilitated the unanimous passing of the two motions that led to the turnaround. "I

Safety threatened

BY RENEE HUANG

Three university-area incidents involving assault or attempted assault in the past two weeks have Kingston Police and Queen's Security concerned about safety.

"There's been a couple of incidents lately where women have been grabbed or surprised," said Louise Fish, director of Queen's Security. Although "no one has received great physical injury... the descriptions [of suspects] have been very vague."

In the first two instances, female students were physically handled by a male assailant "and there was little doubt that his motives were of a sexual nature," said Constable Mike Shultz of the Kingston Police, in a press release. The victims were not seriously assaulted or injured, he said.

The third incident occurred on Wednesday at approximately 4 a.m. A female student was walking down Lower Albert Street when a male

Police warn of date rape drug

BY STEPHANIE CARVIN

After several incidents in the Kingston area where the use of flunitrazepam, dubbed the date rape drug, is suspected, the Kingston Police have issued a warning to the public.

Flunitrazepam, a cousin to another date rape drug rohypnol, is used by assailants to knock out their victims, who are then often raped. It is commonly used in bars, where it is slipped unnoticed into a victim's drink. Once the drug is ingested, people experience confusion, loss of inhibition, dizziness, sudden drowsiness, impaired judgement and, in some cases, brief periods of memory loss. The substance is tasteless and odourless, although recently it has been altered so that its colour could be detected when the drug was added to a liquid. Mike Shultz of the Kingston Police said it is hard to describe the nature of incidents involving the drug since the victims cannot remember events that occur while they are under the drug's influence. "The problem with this particular drug is that there is no memory," he explained.

There has been preventative action taken against date rape drugs on campus. "We are trying to be as proactive as we can," explained Director of Campus Security Louise Fish.

One of Campus Security's efforts has been to raise awareness on campus. "We have put out warnings on Security Alert boards," said Fish, although she indicated that this was not in response to any specific incident.

ESOS (Educating Students On Substances), a group under the Alma Mater Society Social Issues Commission, has also been involved in fostering awareness on campus. During the week preceding Homecoming weekend, the group distributed material about date rape drugs to students.

"We've done other things such as the training of the pub staff [on date rape drug awareness]," said Social Issues Commissioner Naomi Brunemeyer. If new incidents involving the drug arise, the commission will "need to launch a new campaign," she said.

Recently, a new date rape drug, Gamma Hydroxybutyrate, commonly referred to as Liquid G, has become a concern. The drug, which has similar effects to others of its kind, has been

New student fees increase AMS revenue

BY JOCELYN LAPORTE

This year's Alma Mater Society's opt-outable fees show a $19,000 increase in revenue despite a decrease in AMS constituents. The number of students represented by the AMS is 11,200, about 350 less than last year.

The revenue increase is not due to more students opting in, but to the addition of three new fees. Dawn's House Women's Shelter, Studio Q and The Empress together drew more than $20,000 in revenue.

Dawn House Women's Shelter had the most students opting into its $0.50 fee. However, the reason for its popularity may be a result of its accidental omission when fees were available for opt-out by computer in September.

Dawn House is a temporary shelter for homeless women and children who are seeking permanent housing in Kingston. Acting Administrator Laurel Claus-Johnson was ecstatic about the support from the Queen's community. "This is a worthwhile organization to support and I am heartened by the Queen's students' response," she said.

Studio Q, who lost their student fee in the 1996 spring referendum, received $12,877 from opt-outs this

Teens try Queen's

By ANNA NESBITT

Every year students from Brockville to Kingston to Belleville are given the option to experience Queen's life for a day. The Degree for a Day program, which has been held for several years, brought more than 200 students from approximately 25 schools to Queen's on Wednesday.

Sarah Corman, AMS municipal affairs commissioner, and Event Co-Chairs Corrine Kennedy, Arts '00, and Jennifer Klenyewski, Arts '00, organized the day and appeared very enthusiastic about its success.

The goal of the event is "to give high school students the option to see what university is like and to build a bridge from the Queen's students to the high school students," said Klenyewski. "It also offers [the students] a chance to have a tour and check out a class or two."

Before arriving at Queen's for the program, interested high schools students selected a Faculty they would like to learn about. When the students arrived at Queen's on Wednesday, they were broken up into groups according to their choices and matched with a student volunteer from Queen's.

Students spent the morning touring the campus, Stauffer library and attending one or two of their student volunteer's classes. "The tour people were awesome," said Brockville student Cindy Haacala.

Following lunch, students heard from various guest speakers, and were given a chance to see Queen's clubs and ask questions.

Klenyewski said she and Kennedy have received a lot of positive feedback on the event. Some students said the day gave them an idea of what to expect when they attend university.

When asked if the program gave her an idea of what Queen's is like, Haacala replied, "Definitely, the pictures in the Queen's book don't give it the justice it deserves. You have to feel the atmosphere."

However, Haacala's friend Monica Cegledi wasn't as enthusiastic about the campus. "It's alright inside, but the campus is so big... we're not used to that," she explained.

Forty-three schools were asked to participate in this year's event and Kennedy and Klenyewski said they are hoping to increase this number next year. The co-chairwomen are currently corresponding with schools in the Ottawa area to gauge their interest in the program.

CORRECTIONS

In the Sports & Fitness section of the last issue of The Journal, the swimming results were incorrectly identified as rowing.

An article in the same issue about QPID in the News section misidentified Bryan Wills and Andrea Stuparyk as QPID members. Wills, Stuparyk and Amy Lister are all co-directors of the organization.

Another story about security boards off campus quoted the wrong production estimate. The cost should have appeared as $1,200.

OT plans interactive awareness week

By JOCELYN LAPORTE

Occupational therapy students are organizing a promotional display in honour of national Occupational Therapy Awareness Week, running October 25 - 31. The OT Awareness Week committee, consisting primarily of second and third-year OT students, has developed an interactive display involving a game, contest and draw.

"We work in many environments, people may not fully understand the scope of our profession."

— Angelo Paylor, OT committee member

"Basically we are promoting the profession," said Santana Cockram, committee chair. The students hope to bolster interest in their program and illustrate what they are learning, she added.

OT is a health rehabilitation profession. It aims to assist people whose lives have been disrupted by physical illness or injury, developmental problems, the aging process, mental illness and emotional problems.

"We work in many environments, people may not fully understand the scope of our profession," said Angela Paylor, committee member. The committee emphasises the importance of recognizing that the health care system is about interdisciplinary teamwork.

The display is about "where we fit into that team," said Cockram.

Another goal of the committee is to help distinguish OT from physical therapy. OT addresses the psycho-social, social and physical aspects of the client whereas PT focuses solely on physical disabilities and how to regain movement. "OT tries to assist clients to be as autonomous as they can at daily activities in their environments," explained Paylor.

Occupational therapists can be found working in numerous environments, such as hospitals, private practices, community centres, schools, industries and insurance offices. "OTs don't work exclusively with people who have disabilities; we can also work as advisors or consultants in community based developments," explained Carol Walker, committee member.

For information about the OT program and profession students may visit the OT display next week. The display will be in the John Deutsch University Centre next Tuesday and Thursday between 10:30 a.m. and 2:30 p.m., and in Botterell Hall during the same times on Wednesday.

Uphill battle for HRO

By FIONA SCANNELL

In light of increases in obsessive, criminal behaviour, Queen's Human Rights Office is stepping up its efforts to educate students on discrimination and harassment.

According to HRO Director Irène Bujara, despite the fact that many students have undergone human rights awareness training while at Queen's, the HRO has noticed a steady increase in the number of reported incidents of obsessive, criminal behaviour over the past few years.

Bujara said the increase in criminal behaviour usually involves "obsessive jealousy that leads to stalking and harassment." In the past, people may have received unwelcome attention from perpetrators but in recent years, Bujara has seen more cases where the following and harassing leads to criminal harassment with police involvement.

It's difficult to tell if the increase in cases are due to the increase in people's awareness, Bujara said. This issue is being investigated by the HRO and summarized in its annual report.

Although the HRO was established in 1991 in response to the work of the Principal's Advisory Committee on Race Issues, today the most common problems reported to the Human Rights Office involve women's issues, such as sexism, Bujara said. Homophobia is also a major issue at Queen's, and racism, disability, and religious prejudice continue to pose problems, she added.

Since the office opened in 1992 the staff has grown from one director and an administrative assistant to include three full-time coordinators, staff and faculty volunteer advisors, and an advisory council.

The increase in staff has been beneficial because the positions can be quite focus-specific, Bujara explained. For example, coordinator Julie Darke deals with sexual orientation and transgendered issues, and Margot Coulter focuses on sexual harassment cases. Stephanie Simpson, one of the newest coordinators, specializes in racism, with a strong focus on religious discrimination, and is responsible for coordinating efforts in education.

The HRO's annual report to Queen's Senate will be available to the Queen's community in November, and will include specific statistics regarding human rights issues at Queen's during the 1997 school year.

While the HRO attempts to balance the time and resources spent on standing in the side yard of a nearby house approached her. He called out to her and she ran back the way she came before he was able to get close to her.

The man was described as large and well-built, approximately 6 feet tall, similar to the description of the perpetrator who assaulted a female student on University Avenue on October 3.

Shultz is advising staff and students to take extra precaution, especially when walking alone or through dimly lit areas. "We want to make sure people remember that we're here," explained

Fish. "We'll come and give you an escort."

"[Mike Shultz] wants to put an alert out to watch your back," she continued. "We're trying to do our best."

Fish stressed the importance of taking advantage of Queen's safety resources, such as Walkhome or Campus Security Escorts. Both Fish and Shultz emphasized the presence of blue emergency lights and two-way phones posted around campus and implored people to use them if they feel threatened.

Anyone with information about the incidents are asked to call Campus Security at 545-6733.

Job prospects don't depend on degree

By LINDSAY BLAKELY

In an increasingly fast-paced job market, many students are worried that their degree program is hurting, not helping, their job prospects. Jim Kelly, director of Career Services, says those fears are largely unfounded.

Fourth-year history major Deirdre Horgan is feeling the pressure to find a job after she graduates from Queen's. "I'm worried about being able to compete successfully against business students in today's competitive job market," she said.

However, according to Kelly, a large proportion of companies, including Andersen and McKinsey consulting firms, are interested in students from all disciplines. Kelly assured students who share Horgan's concerns that "Arts and science students have competed well with commerce and engineering students for jobs in certain areas."

Kelly explained that many employers are concerned primarily with applicants' interest in their company and the way in which the applicants' skills and drive will add value to the organization and be compatible with the company culture. Kelly said it is imperative that individuals develop skills that they will be able to apply to a variety of jobs.

The most important part of finding a job is marketing yourself effectively. Kelly emphasized, adding, those people who market themselves well succeed even in a tight job market. "A person has to be aware of who they are and what they have to present," he said.

In recognition of the importance of career preparation in today's competitive job market, Queen's Career Services offers students resources designed to ease their transition into the working world, while encouraging them to highlight their marketable skills.

According to Kelly, the job of the career counsellors is to help students determine their interests and skills. The emphasis is on equipping all students with the tools needed for continued career satisfaction and success, he said.

"Arts and science students have competed well with commerce and engineering students for jobs."

— Jim Kelly, director of Career Services

The job market is not static, so there will always be times when finding a job seems particularly trying, Kelly explained.

Last year, Anderson Consulting hired a number of Queen's grads, however, Kelly warned that this does not necessarily represent a trend. The hiring in other years could be different depending on the interests of students and the needs of the company, he explained.

Kelly also mentioned Proctor and Gamble as a company who has hired significant numbers of Queen's grads in the past and he predicted the company will continue to do so in the future.

Kelly noted that not all students have jobs in the forefront of their minds immediately following graduation. At least one-third of arts and science students reported they are in their chosen disciplines because they want it to lead them to a professional degree, such as law, medicine and journalism, or a graduate program in a specific discipline, according to studies by Career Services.

banned in the U.S. since 1990 but has also been recently linked to several sexual assaults in the U.S.

Although there is no direct proof that any date rape drug is in the Kingston area, the police warning indicated that people should be aware that it is in existence and be suspicious if they suffer symptoms connected with the drug. "It is an advisory for people," said Shultz. "If they don't know anything about [the drug] then they should find out... people should be really careful."

Safeguards against date-rape drugs

- Never leave a drink unattended.
- Don't accept drinks from strangers or someone you don't trust.
- When at a bar only take drinks from the server or bartender.
- Don't accept open container drinks from anyone at parties.
- Keep an eye on the behaviour of your friends and have them watch out for yours.
- Make arrangements beforehand to leave the party with a friend or someone that you trust.

Student needs 'priority'

education and awareness campaigns with the daily treatment of individual cases of discrimination and harassment, the needs of Queen's students are always a priority, said Bujara.

"We don't want to discourage anyone from coming here," she explained. "While we do not have the resources to be a 24-hour crisis centre, we help while we're here."

Bujara emphasized that there are barriers to education that may not be recognized by many students and faculty at Queen's. Aboriginal people, for instance, are historically underrepresented in the university system, she said.

"It is unfortunate to say, but the people who have their human rights infringed upon are usually those who are traditionally vulnerable in the Canadian and university society," Bujara said.

Access to post-secondary education is often jeopardized by policies that might not appear to be outwardly discriminatory, such as departmental regulations stating that high school must be completed within a limited amount of time. If 90 per cent of Aboriginal people don't finish secondary education in one span, Bujara stated, their access to higher education is hindered.

Students may visit the HRO, located in the Old Medical School Building, if they need information regarding the current state of human rights infringement and materials dealing with human rights issues, which students may access.

Two motions pass

am pleased with the recent developments," said Harris. "The departments have both worked very hard to make this happen."

According to Harris, the first motion was "to support the addition of an option in materials engineering to the mechanical engineering undergraduate program, effective September 1, 1999." The second motion was "that faculty members in the Department of materials engineering be invited to transfer voluntarily to the department of mechanical engineering, effective immediately."

The gradual phasing out of enrolment in materials and metallurgical engineering will coincide with a phasing in of enrolment in the new materials option in mechanical engineering. Students who are currently enrolled in the materials and Metallurgical program will have until 2002 to graduate.

"It was a difficult issue to resolve," said Keith Stewart, president of the Engineering Society. "In engineering, there are issues involving accreditation. If one program falters, the whole faculty can be affected."

Stewart said he is enthusiastic about the new developments. "It seems like a good plan... The only real difference would be that your degree would read differently."

"It's really not a major issue as far as industry is concerned," Stewart continued. "[Industry] is far more concerned with what you can do, not what your degree says."

"I am very satisfied and pleased with all that the two departments have done together to resolve these issues," said Leggett, in a telephone interview yesterday. "I would like to complement all involved for the positive spirit that has prevailed throughout these developments."

During yesterday's Senate meeting Leggett said, "The [new] undergraduate and graduate program has life in the context of its strengthening move forward."

More students opt into health plan

year. "It will be nice to put money back into the program, equipment and people who volunteered so we can show how much we appreciate them," said Executive Producer Ariel Goldblatt.

Another factor affecting opt-out numbers this year is the transfer of the Law Students Society to the Society of Graduate and Professional Students, reducing the number of potential opt-ins. Approximately 476 students were enrolled in the LSS last year.

Typically, 70 per cent of students opt-in to fees, explained

Gregg McKeller, AMS information officer. This means the law students' move to the SGPS presumably lost the AMS about 333 opt-ins.

This year, 7,800 student opted into the Health Plan, down from approximately 7,870 students last year. In light of the loss of LSS students, this number actually represents an increase. "I consider that an increase in percentage terms," said Gord Moodie, AMS vice-president (operations).

"Everything on there will make our budget better. In total it has a positive effect," said Moodie.

QIAA attends conference

Former PM Campbell addresses students

By SHAWN BRIMLEY

Last weekend, 28 Queen's students travelled to Ottawa to participate in a foreign policy conference entitled Independent Partners: Canada, the USA and the World. In addition to being surrounded by government ministers and ambassadors, the trip gave the students an opportunity to interact with such notable Canadian figures as former Prime Minister Kim Campbell.

The trip was organized by the Queen's International Affairs Association, a student-run organization which has recently forged a partnership with the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

Mike Callen, QIAA president said, "This year's partnership with CIAA is a unique situation across Canada. We are now leading the way and other schools are looking to us for leadership."

The conference included past and present government ministers and ambassadors, with keynote speakers including Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Campbell, who is presently Canadian Consul General in Los Angeles.

"It was really good to talk to people who are working in the field of international relations," said QIAA Finance Director Elaine Wu.

During the conference, Lloyd Axworthy spoke about the recent worldwide treaty on land mines and urged the United States to sign on. Axworthy also focused on the concept of human security and the importance of the individual person in issues of foreign policy.

Kim Campbell delivered an address criticizing the lack of Canadian media programming in the United States and the proliferation of American programming in Canada. She emphasized the importance of regulating American content in order to maintain the identities and conceptions of Canadian culture. "She's a fascinating [political figure] who is firm in her convictions," Callen said. "She said that she is interested in speaking at Queen's this year."

The crisis in the international markets was also a concern as experts discussed ways to minimize the impact on North America. "The volatility of financial markets over the past months has served to underline the fact that, in an era of globalization, complacency is not an option," Axworthy said.

QIAA will be sending delegates to the Harvard Model United Nations in February as representatives of the United Kingdom. "It's a big deal for Queen's... as Harvard played that role last year," Callen said.

Let them eat pepper

IT COMES AS NO SURPRISE THAT the Prime Minister considers the pepper spray used by police to subdue student protesters at the APEC summit 'civilized' — he probably would have preferred wading into the crowd and strangling protesters himself or jabbing Inuit sculptures at them. Jean Chrétien's own penchant for violence aside, his latest suggestion that pepper spray was a more civilized method of crowd control than using baseball bats is the last straw in a series of arrogant remarks made about the APEC fiasco.

This last gaffe about baseball bats sounded more like what one would expect to hear from the former despot of a certain Southeast Asian country.

In the face of allegations of police brutality and the charge that student's basic civil rights were trampled on by order of the prime minister's office, Chrétien has repeatedly belittled the issue. This last gaffe about baseball bats sounded more like what one would expect to hear from the former despot of a certain Southeast Asian country. Previous comments about eating pepper-steaks in the west and putting pepper on his plate seem to demonstrate how far out of touch Chrétien is with the seriousness of this issue. Furthermore, his government's automatic refusal to pay legal costs for the students testifying before the RCMP inquiry, and Solicitor General Andy Scott's loose lips about the whole affair make a mockery of our justice system.

If the PM's flippant attitude about the APEC affair is any indication of his view on civil liberties, then maybe it is time he consider stepping down in favour of someone with more respect for our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Go commando style

WHILE OUR FATHERS AND their fathers before them may have been constrained in their choice of underwear, males of our generation enjoy more freedom to clothe themselves as they see fit. While the perennial issue of boxers versus briefs may not seem to be a pressing issue on our campus or in society in general, it is a choice that every male must confront on a daily basis. Indeed, many women also admit to having a vested interest in the choices that men make on this issue.

One obvious concern is the aesthetic value of certain styles of men's underwear. In a society that places so much weight on fashionable outerwear, it seems natural to extend that scrutiny to all layers of clothing. It is hard, however, to gauge the appearance of men's underwear, since they are rarely seen by anyone but the wearer. Nonetheless, it can be stated with virtual certainty (or really with a very subjective opinion) that the image of a man wearing nothing but tight briefs is less appealing than boxers.

That said, style and appearance are not the only important considerations involved in making this choice. Proponents of briefs argue that the functionality and the security of having a 'tight package' make a strong case for choosing briefs over boxers. On the other hand, support does not always equal comfort and, according to scientific research, it may lessen one's chance of having children.

In either case, one unfortunate drawback of men wearing any underwear in an intimate situation, is the tendency to pitch a tent, although this is surely exacerbated by wearing briefs. There is, of course, a third alternative: wearing nothing at all.

HEY - SINCE YOU'VE GOT THAT HANDY, CAN I GET SOME FOR MY STEAK?

Fight for our rights

I AM DISAPPOINTED WITH THE apathy on our campus surrounding the arrest of dozens of student protesters during last year's APEC summit at the University of British Columbia. The issues go far beyond what happened that day, and what is happening today in the RCMP inquiry and in the House of Commons.

The importance of the rights enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms cannot be overstated, nor can they be overlooked when debating the extent to which authorities can intervene in the affairs of the individual.

I am very concerned about this dearth of discussion.

I am ashamed that this campus and our elected representatives aren't doing more to raise awareness about this fundamental issue. It's not just a student concern but a concern for every person in this country.

Now, I'm not saying that people should drop everything and focus on this issue, but our student governments should definitely be drafting letters of protest, signing petitions and enlisting support of local politicians. Frankly, this preoccupation with alignment and tuition fees is very narrow in scope and disturbing. Perhaps part of the blame goes to The Journal, for not covering the issues. We try our best to be diverse, but it seems that the same issues are revisited time and again, and thus it is difficult for a news section to raise awareness on topics that aren't being talked about at all.

I am very concerned about this dearth of discussion, because if we as students let this issue drift away from public consciousness, then we will be doing a disservice to everything this country stands for: justice, equality of rights and the freedom of speech to name a few. We would also be failing every student that dared to speak out and exercise their democratic right to protest at APEC.

I was researching a paper the other day on the history of the Kent State student protest on May 4, 1970, in Ohio, where four students died and nine were injured when the National Guard opened fire on the protesters. The media and public portrayed the students as dirty and lice-ridden, and some even said they should have shot more of them. This made me think about how precious every ounce of our civil liberty is, and to commit myself to trying, in my limited capacity, to speak out and attempt to make a small difference. I urge all members of the Queen's community to do the same.

We haven't come that far, baby Optimism about the end of sexual violence unfounded

A WOMYN'S VOICE

I AM RESPONDING TO THE ARTICLE "Pushing back the shadows" published in Surface magazine. The author has proclaimed the effective end of violence against women. He suggests that while "there are (of course) many people outside the cultural mainstream who still operate according to the old paradigm" which states that women are viewed as "sexual objects and property," women rarely face such attitudes today.

The author laments the fact that way back in the dark ages of the 1970s "most cops didn't take rape seriously" and "there were few rape crisis centres to go to and many legal obstacles to prosecution." He then goes on to suggest that this has all changed drastically as "today we display much more sensitivity to [survivors'] needs at the institutional level."

The author finally proposes that media portrayals have come so far that women are never shown as objects, treated violently, or depicted performing unwanted sexual acts on TV or in movies. I would respectfully submit that you've got to be kidding.

How are women thoroughly safe if one in four of us can expect to be sexually assaulted, in most cases before the age of 16?

How can this kind of violence have been eradicated when the author still assumes that "of course" some people will always be violent towards women? How are women thoroughly safe if one in four of us can expect to be sexually assaulted, in most cases before the age of 16? Are obstacles to reporting these crimes really gone if only six per cent of assaults are reported to the police and even fewer result in convictions? Have assault and marital rape laws been very helpful if 69 per cent of assaults are perpetrated by acquaintances?

In a staggering survey, four out of five female undergrads at Canadian universities reported being victims of dating violence, with 29 per cent of those incidents including sexual assault. In another study, 60 per cent of Canadian college-aged males said they would commit sexual assault if they were certain they wouldn't get caught. Do you really think we've come that far?

The author also suggests that too little time and energy have been expended on "sexual violence that isn't male-female." While I agree that males who experience violence of any kind are just as entitled to vindication and support as females, I would like to point out that at least twice as many females experience sexual violence as males. In addition, 99 per cent of all assaults are perpetrated by men. That's a pretty glaring pattern. The author does admit that some sexual violence occurs, but he seems to insinuate that it is negligible.

The author also seems to suggest that women and men of our parents' generation worked together to achieve this utopia of non-violence. However, it is more accurate to say that a handful of feminists with very little support fought long and hard for whatever gains we have made. I am left wondering on what basis does the author of this article declare the almost complete end of sexual violence against women, and by what right.

AMS Assembly Students deserve choice

Dear Editors,

It was with great disappointment that I read in The Journal that our representatives at AMS Assembly voted against allowing a question to be placed on the fall referendum which would ask students if they wanted to join OUSA. I have since spoken to a number of people who were present at the Assembly meeting and I can say that I am ashamed to be represented by this Assembly.

From the accounts that I have been told, most of the debate was centred around the issue of whether students would be able to grasp the issue of aligning with an external lobbying group during the two week referendum campaign. The argument was made that since our Assembly representatives didn't feel that they had enough information to decide the issue, that average students couldn't possibly be trusted to make the decision.

An interesting thing to note though is that although speaker after speaker rose to say that they didn't have enough information, never once did they specify what it was that they wanted to know.

The absurdity of Assembly continued as our representatives argued that students could not possibly be expected to grasp the issue at hand over the course of a two week campaign. That is interesting. It seems to me that when our representatives were elected (or, in most cases, acclaimed or appointed) in February they too had a two week campaign period in which there was more than just one issue for the average student to think about. If our representatives don't think that we're smart enough to make this one decision, then perhaps they should resign since they obviously don't have the confidence in the people who put them in office.

But here's the kicker. After our representatives argued that we weren't capable of making a decision on our own, a motion was passed to make the vote a secret ballot. Why? After more than three months of debating this issue, why did our representatives not want the students they represent to know how they voted? If they were truly looking out for our best interests, then why are they afraid to say so on the record? It's absolutely unconscionable for our student leaders to hide behind a secret ballot vote.

It is my understanding that the debate also centred around a definition of democracy, but as far as I'm concerned, along with democracy comes accountability, a concept this Assembly has obviously never heard of. Shame on them.

I date each and every one of the 18 Assembly representatives to write in and explain why they did so, and why they agreed to a secret ballot vote. I hope these Assembly representatives have the courage to put their money where their mouths are.

Whose interests are you representing?

Dear Editors,

I am a second-year Arts and Science student. I like to think that I have a relatively good ability to grasp concept presented to me. I would also like to believe that throughout my 16 years of schooling I have shown the ability to research issues in order to present an informed opinion. And so it was with amazement that I discovered that AMS Assembly voted 18-16 that I could not have the opportunity to learn about and vote on a question in the fall referendum about aligning with the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance.

The arguments that I have heard for why this motion was defeated are insulting at best. I have spoken to people who were at the meeting, and I trust that the minutes of the meeting, when made available, will verify what I have been told. It is my understanding that Assembly members don't feel comfortable that they knew all the information necessary, that students couldn't possibly be trusted with this decision. Furthermore, I have been told that at least one speaker implied that students didn't have the physical brain capacity to store all the information required, a notion which I'm sure every student would agree is absurd.

It was argued by those opposed to the motion that they didn't feel it was necessary to bring the question to students if they themselves don't agree that we should join OUSA. This argument is severely flawed. Most Assembly representatives were either appointed and have very little claim to any sort of mandate from the greater student body. In fact, most Assembly members never ran on any sort of platform, and they certainly didn't specify how they felt about alignment or OUSA during the February election campaign.

So those Assembly members that voted against this motion have absolutely no constituency to point to in terms of representation. And unfortunately, although these Assembly members, according to accounts that I heard, were claiming to be defending democratic principles, they also passed a motion to have the vote be done through secret ballot. This is nothing more than a shameful ploy to avoid accountability for their actions. If certain Assembly members claimed to be representing my interests, then why won't they come forward and tell me, on record, that they did so? What are they afraid of?

It is with great pleasure that I will add my name to the petition now circulating to have the question placed on the fall referendum regardless, or in spite of, the Assembly vote; however, I am disgusted that Assembly has forced me to spend the time doing that. If they had truly been representing students, they would have saved us the time and energy and allowed the question to be asked.

Responses show lack of awareness

Dear Editors,

I would like to congratulate the IDIS 302 class — "Race & Racism" — for initiating a discussion of racism on Queen's campus last week. The actions taken by members of the class have had intellectual spread-effects in many of our departments, on our sidewalks and in our classrooms.

We must go through a painful process before we can even enter into a multicultural society.

Of course, within this process of racism and anti-racism we come across obstacles and we recognize ways we could improve. Education, as pointed out by many of the students in tutorial groups, is the key to this process. However, the students in IDIS 302 have, unlike the official stand of Canada, actually attacked the faculties of multiculturalism. They have begun the dialogue between us and have made us aware that we must be educated, we must go through a painful process before we can even enter into a multicultural society.

It involves all of us, not only those those of us who are offended by racial stereotypes. The fact that Ian Collins argues that "a significant percentage of the Queen's population did not find the poster offensive" (October 20th) only indicates the lack of education and awareness of cultural racism that permeates on our campus.

My only hope is that we can move forward with this — we need not concentrate on the specific issues of "who said what," but rather, I suggest, we spend our time understanding the actions of our students, their hurt, their anger and most of all their strength. We have the capability to be educated, we have the potential to change.

The Struggle Continues....

Campus Cuts

Cutting schools a simplistic answer

Dear Editors,

Adam Kaminsky's suggestion that the solution to the problems of the Canadian post-secondary education industry lies in cutting schools is simplistic. It is simplistic because it is based in the notion that there are major economies of scale in the industry.

The salaries of administrators represent only a small portion of the budgets at each university in the country. Any savings realized from university closure are pretty small in the global scheme of things.

Any savings realized from university closure are pretty small in the global scheme of things.

Kaminsky's suggestion is also simplistic because it ignores the reality that the rationalization of programs, let alone universities, is a highly political issue. A few years ago, the government of Nova Scotia attempted to close and merge a number of programs in order to make the system more efficient. This attempt failed because the government finally concluded that the political cost of rationalization was greater than any economic savings.

Finally, the notion that schools on the periphery (Lakehead, Nipissing) are somehow inferior to Queen's and more expendable than Queen's, purely because of their location, is really objectionable. If the government were to seriously consider Kaminsky's suggestion and eliminate programs that "are not that good anyway," relative to others at the provincial or national level, Queen's may become a lot smaller!

University education more than training

Dear Editors,

Did I just get hooked by the bait of Adam Kaminsky's October 20 editorial, or was it a joke? Words such as "backwards" referring to certain universities, the arrogant tone which assumes Queen's students somehow deserve a post-secondary education over the students of, say, Lakehead, and his failure to recognize the frequent causal relationship between the economically elite and the intellectually elite made me think I was living in a parallel universe.

I have been so nearly moved to write a letter to The Journal in the last six weeks (e.g. regarding the frightful conservative lash-out at Marte Natvik's article on pregnancy, which proved to me the currency of feminist examinations of the mother as monstrous, or regarding the articles on feminism itself—don't get me started), but today Mr. Kaminsky inspired me — was it all just a dream? Funny that the masthead reads: "Opinions Editor, Vacant."

Assuming Mr. Kaminsky wrote his editorial in all seriousness, I would like to address some of his assumptions, and provide alternative ways of thinking about post-secondary education.

First off, it is obvious from Mr. Kaminsky's piece that he assumes he is a student at an intellectually elite school, but if an international body were to decide that only 0.000001 per cent of the Western world's population would be judged to be of the intellectual elite — great. Keep Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Oxford, Cambridge and maybe the Sorbonne open. Surely, in someone's opinion their general arts programs are better than those at Queen's. A standardized test should clear away the riff-raff, and separate out the real leaders of tomorrow. That would save lots of money which could go towards staving off the international monetary crises, but would most students at Queen's be at university?

Secondly who are the "intellectually elite?" It is naive to think everyone has the same educational chances and studies suggest that being "smart" (i.e. doing well in school) is linked to how wealthy a child's parents are. From a young age a child's intellectual development can depend on economics. The fate of those who do not "cut it" is often determined much earlier than the post-secondary education application stage.

Thirdly Mr. Kaminsky (and the Harris government) conflate a university education with job training. While this is the most common way of looking at things, there are students and citizens who think differently, who see the "use" of education in a different light. Four years of studying an arts subject many not put you in good stead to get a job, but it might make you a better human than you were when you started.

I have been so nearly moved to write a letter to The Journal in the last six weeks (e.g. regarding the frightful conservative lash-out at Marte Natvik's article on pregnancy, which proved to me the currency of feminist examinations of the mother as monstrous, or regarding the articles on feminism itself—don't get me started), but today Mr. Kaminsky inspired me — was it all just a dream? Dear Editors,

I couldn't believe my eyes so I had to run (not walk) to my Oxford Dictionary of Current English to get an actual quote. Yes, a novel is still a "fictitious prose story of book length". A social history, such as Michael Dawson's The Mountie appears to be (Features, October 20), is not a novel.

Face it: students drink pop

Dear Editors,

I was utterly appalled to read Michael Johnson's article regarding the issue of Queen's selling exclusive rights to one of the major soft drink companies. Mr. Johnson felt little inclination to address pertinent factors concerning this issue, such as the questionable practices of Coke and Pepsi, or the notion of a controlled market in the university. In fact, had Mr. Johnson desired to write an unbiased article, he might have indulged readers by including the word "Pepsi" at least once.

Nevertheless, the travesty is simply that Mr. Johnson felt a need to discuss the legitimacy of soft drinks in general. Does Mr. Johnson actually believe that there are Queen's students who are ignorant of the nutritional value of soft drinks? Obviously, pop isn't healthy. Neither is alcohol! Should we then close Alfie's, Clark and the QP? If the question were put forward whether or not to offer exclusive rights to either Molson or Labatt, would Mr. Johnson feel obligated to mention the evils of beer?

Soft drinks are consumed on campus. That is a fact. Which company sells the soft drinks is the issue, not whether or not soft drinks are healthy. As for the ludicrous act of comparing Coke to heroin, I myself am curious whether or not Mr. Johnson has attended any of his science courses. The comparison of Coke and heroin is so outlandish that it does not warrant refutation.

As for the "vending machines that are soon to be found in abundance on campus," where exactly are more vending machines to be added? Most, if not all buildings contain them! Granted, Mr. Johnson is not in Commerce, but one would assume that he would realize that exclusive rights do not translate to increased market. If soft drink companies felt that the campus would support more vending machines, why would they hesitate to add them?

The companies involved, Coke and Pepsi, are not saints. Many of their practices are at best, questionable. (Hmmm, could that be a topic for an article, Mikey?) Sponsorship does not mean that students have to buy products. They are already doing that. If Mr. Johnson feels oppressed by colas, then he and all those who are like minded are by all means welcome to boycott the products.

As long as students are drinking pop, and bursaries, scholarships and general educational funding are being cut, why not profit from an existing market?

Polyamory

Let's get it on

Dear Editors,

It was with great pleasure that we noted your editorial piece in the October 12 issue of The Journal discussing the merits of a "polyamorous" lifestyle. It is high time that the positive aspects of non-traditional romantic involvement are deservedly brought forward into the light of day.

Would you believe that "polyamory" does not even appear in the Oxford English Dictionary? Let's face it: the standard conservative notion of love is becoming antiquated in the modern world. We are proud to see that The Journal is once again at the cutting edge of today's emerging social trends.

In the spirit of this quest to enlighten, we would like to open the eyes of the Queen's community to several other relationship options available.

For example, the editorial failed to mention the digitophallic relationship, a legitimate option for individuals who shy away from the fierce competitiveness of the "bar scene." The convenience of this form of attachment manifests itself in a frequency of tomanic encounters unparalleled in any other form of relationship; digitophallic bonds are known to be formed throughout the Student Village, in some homes perhaps seven or eight times daily.

Another trend in contemporary romantic interaction is mononotalism, which appeals to those who feel confined by traditional assumptions dictating that a loving bond requires more than eleven hours to fully blossom, and insisting that such bonds must extend beyond a single night to "count" as meaningful relationships.

Along these same liberating lines lie domestic-bestial relationships, including cano-genital and felino-proctal forms of expression that finally break down the arrogant humanocentric assumption that true love must be species-specific.

Again, kudos to The Journal for their open yet level-headed approach to the changing society to which our university community belongs. Your editorial stated it perfectly: the answer to rising divorce rates and an increasingly unstable family unit is a sexual free-for-all in which everybody lovingly beds everybody else, perhaps at the same time.

Parenting

I love my mom

Dear Editors,

As a child of a single mother, I find Andrew Zur's letter ["Feminists' shouldn't speak of tits," Friday Oct. 16] to be offensive and misinformed.

Mr. Zur states, in regards to Marte Natvik's article on her experiences with motherhood, "If, as the article implies, the father is not in the picture, then the boy is likely to be materially and emotionally deprived and society should be judgmental." I'd like to see some statistics here.

Letters to the Editors

I, for one, am a very well-adjusted individual, and I can not see how being raised by my mother alone placed any sort of restraint on my development as a person and as a man. It is not a person's sex that determines how good a parent they are, but rather the quality of their heart. Granted, being alone does make raising a child more difficult, but, like my mother, most parents would go to any length to make their children happy.

It is not a person's sex that determines how good a parent they are, but rather the quality of their heart.

Zur goes on to say, "But these days, everyone is all right a-okay and those who point these things out are the villains." I am not trying to vilify Andrew Zur, however it must be pointed out that right-wing attitudes like this create stereotypes and propagate misinformation. The last time I checked, it wasn't illegal to have a child, and therefore our society should not be judgmental of those who do, regardless of their situation.

What we should be doing is fostering an open environment in order that those who need help can find it, without the peering eyes and snide remarks of would-be judges.

Breaking the ice

AFPs could protect crops, food, tissues

By SONJA GRGAR

BARE TREES AND MORE FREQUENT mornings indicate that winter is slowly creeping up to our door steps. However, with most of us having the luxury of indoor heating, we pay little attention to how some of our "fellow creatures" will be making it through the cold. One assumes that when it gets chilly, organisms like fish, insects and plants would have to find an alternative to whipping out an electric radiator. So, how do organisms in cold climates save themselves from an icy fate?

The answer is antifreeze proteins (AFPs), naturally occurring substances that have the power to inhibit freezing or reduce its effects. One source of knowledge of these cellular constituents is the Protein Engineering Network of Centres of Excellence (PENCE), a federal organization that joins that forces of industry and Canada's leading university researchers. PENCE is currently running an antifreeze research project, headed by Queen's biochemistry professor, Peter Davies. Davies has been involved with AFPs for over two decades — ever since his colleagues at Memorial University discovered that those very proteins were responsible for the Atlantic flounder's incredible resistance to cold.

Davies explains that AFPs are macromolecules found in most cold climate organisms. Scientists are familiar with several dozen AFP structures, which work their magic by physically binding to the ice crystal surface. This interaction stops other water molecules from joining the crystal, and thus either inhibits its formation or controls its growth. Since different AFP types have individual three-dimensional structures, they all bind to different ice crystal planes, and in different locations within an organism — external tissues and circulatory system in fish, or extra-cellular space in plants, for example.

Davies says that his research is driven by an "interest in the biological questions of how AFPs actually protect organisms, and how they evolved to do this job." However, the work of his team goes beyond the mere study of these proteins. Since the method of obtaining AFPs naturally (by bleeding fish) is both tedious and costly, there is a real need for an effective artificial synthesis method. This is where PENCE researchers run into a challenge with the complexity of AFPs, because the only means of precisely synthesizing entire large molecules is by cloning, which proves to be too expensive on a large scale. The most plausible alternative lies in what Davies calls "semi-synthetic AFPs," where the smallest essential structure of an AFP molecule would be produced by chemical synthesis, and then joined with another cheap protein. However, the enormous diversity of AFPs makes the task of pinpointing that smallest essential structure extremely difficult. Although Davies' team has had some success in dealing with that challenge, he still says that "at this point in time I really could not say what the critical feature of AFP is."

Professor Peter Davies admires a ice crystal lattice model he keeps around his office for just this sort of photo op.

So, what avenues does this research open in terms of practical application? AFPs could, providing that an efficient method for their synthesis is found, greatly reduce the amount of frost damage to crops. Davies also sees potential benefits for fish farming, and says that he "would very much like to have another go at making an AFP-producing salmon" by introducing the protein through gene transfer, a technique that has borne some success already.

The frozen food industry, believe it or not, may also be able to derive some benefits from the AFPs. The alternating warming and cooling technique used in most freezers enlarge ice crystals and lead to food decay over time. AFPs possess a unique ability to maintain the size of these crystals in ice cream or frozen yogurt. But since the "semi-synthetic" AFPs do not differ greatly from the natural ones, consumers' aesthetic perception of having fish or insect antifreeze protein in their food may be a concern in this kind of application.

One of the most intriguing applications of AFPs lies in medicine. Adding these proteins to a solution containing organs, tissues, platelets, or embryos could help with cryopreservation, tissue preservation by freezing. Experimental cryosurgery, which involves freezing malignant tissues in the attempt to destroy them, could exploit AFPs extremely well. The presence of AFP's produces thin, sharp crystals that, according to Davies, "form like a series of needles that can puncture or shear cells." The only concern with this and any other biomedical application would be the patient's reaction to the introduction of a foreign protein, where the creation of antibodies could prove to be problematic in repetitive treatment.

Although all of the potential AFP applications are still in their fledgling stages, there is no doubt that much can be expected when research such as this succeeds in harnessing the power of that cycle: learning from nature, reproducing and modifying some of its achievements, and ultimately bestowing the benefits back onto the original source.

HIV doesn't cause AIDS?

Speaking in Toronto last weekend, Nobel laureate (chemistry, 1993) Kary Mullis contended that, after a thorough search of the scientific literature, he can still find no proof that the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) causes AIDS. Mullis is somewhat notorious in the scientific community for his controversial views; he has claimed, for example, that there is no basis to either ozone layer depletion or global warming.

New bacterium makes alcohol from biomass

The days of producing ethanol, used in industry and as fuel, from food crops such as corn and grain may soon be over. Construction of the first chemical plant to produce ethanol from agricultural and lumber waste began on Tuesday in Jennings, Louisiana. The transgenic bacterium used in the process was designed at the Institute of Food and Agricultural Sciences at the University of Florida. The organism was engineered by cloning the genes needed to convert sugars into ethanol, found in yeast and some higher plants, and inserting them into the genome of bacteria that can digest not only sugar but also complex polysaccharides like the cellulose in plant cell walls.

Star Trek: Deep Space 1

A comparatively tiny space craft called Deep Space 1 will be launched next week to test several new technologies, including an automatic navigation system that uses a database of 250,000 star positions and an ion-drive propulsion system. The ion-drive uses solar power to heat and accelerate electrons into a chamber of xenon gas. The thrust from the resulting xenon cations will eventually push DS1 to a speed of 12,900 km-h.

French degrees of education

In France, universities are plagued with high enrolment, lack of teachers and insufficient funding. ~ Is this the model of accessible education? ~

By KRISTIN GABLE

Kristin Gable is a third year Queen's student reporting from Université Lumière Lyon 2 where she is currently studying abroad.

OCTOBER 15, 1998, THE RIVERSIDE DOWNTOWN campus of Université Lumière Lyon 2 in Lyon, France. It's the kind of day a Maclean's "university ranking" photographer would rave over. The sky is clear, a crisp breeze punctuates the air and the ground is scattered with gold and rust-coloured autumn leaves. Students and faculty fill the numerous benches and walkways, and inside the classrooms of beautiful, historic campus buildings, serious intellectual discussion on everything from Sartre to Chirac to the Revolution of 1789 takes place.

An image of scholastic perfection? Not quite. In the distance, just across the Rhône, there's the distant thunder of hundreds of angry, young voices shouting in unison. Soon, a mob begins to approach the university buildings. Hundreds upon hundreds of local lycéens (that's French-talk for high school students) have taken to the streets to protest what they perceive as unfavourable conditions in their centres of learning: a lack of teachers, a lack of computer access and a surplus of students in the classrooms, among other things. The main target of their angry cries? Claude Allègre, Ministre de l'Éducation Nationale (Minister of Education) under the leadership of Prime Minister Lionel Jospin of the predominantly left-wing Parti Socialiste (PS).

Among the slogans visible on the crude, home-made banners floating in the crowd are "Allègre, t'es foutu: la jeunesse est dans la Rue (Allègre, you're damned: the youth is in the streets)" and "Lycéens en Grève (Students on strike)." Despite the negative nature of the students' message, they almost look more like celebrants than they do protesters: many have painted faces, and many more are engaged in a bizarre kind of line-dance while singing a song that I will NOT repeat about Allègre and the wonder drug Viagra. It is an amazing sight.

These students were among the hundreds of thousands who have taken to the streets across the country during the past few days to express their frustration with the powers that be in the French government. They are not, by any means, the first.

One day in the not-so-distant future, the majority of these students will decide to enroll in one of the approximately 90 government-funded universities which operate in France today. When they do, they will be entering a realm that has long experienced problems eerily similar to the ones currently being experienced by the lycéens. The lycéens could easily be mistaken for those university students who participated in what have been regarded by many as some of the most significant movements in the recent history of France. Today's students have proved that they can protest with the best of them (French Revolution, anyone?).

However, while "La manifestation" (student demonstrations) has certainly been an issue in the past for universities in France, it is important to note that is but one aspect of a historically rich and wonderfully complex system.

ACCORDING TO Studying and Working in France: A Student Guide by Russell Cousins, Ron Hallmark and Ian Pickup, the very first universities in France began to appear in the 13th century, and existed under the control of the Church until the French Revolution of 1789. The groundwork for the contemporary French university system was laid out in part by Napoleon, who espoused the concept of an "imperial university" (l'Université Impériale) that encompassed the entire educational experience, from primary school onward.

This is a fundamental belief in French culture that a university education should be accessible to all... "instruction must be possible for everyone."

Today, many, many years and many, many, many reforms later, French universities make up one part of a broad system of post-secondary education (l'enseignement supérieur). Any graduating lycéen with a Baccalauréat Général or a Baccalauréat Technologique — two forms of French high school diplomas — has the right to choose to enroll in a French university, where they would have the opportunity to study a broad range of subjects similar to those taught in Canadian universities.

For example, according to the 1998-99 "Livret d'Accueil des Étudiants," the official student handbook of l'Université Lumière Lyon 2, three out of four Lyon 2 students are currently enrolled in the liberal arts-oriented disciplines of Lettres, Langues et Sciences Humaines. According to Jean-Pierre Bonnavard, chargé de mission of the Division of International Relations at the university, of the numerous degree programs available, most French university students opt to obtain the nationally recognized standard diplomas known as the Diplômes d'État or Diplômes Nationaux. The Diplôme d'Études Universitaires Générales (DEUG) is awarded after two years of study, followed by the Licence after a third year of study and the Maîtrise (Masters Degree) after four years, which then leads into different forms of higher education.

The Licence is not unlike the Canadian Bachelors degree, while the Maîtrise resembles a Canadian Masters. According to Cousins, Hallmark and Pickup, the Diplômes d'État/Nationaux are designed so as to provide a general introduction to a given subject area in the early stages with increasing specialization as the years progress. It should be noted that these Diplômes only present one option for university students. Many universities, for example, offer what are known as Diplômes d'Université, which are shorter, more specialized programs specific to individual universities that may be taken instead of, or in addition to, the DEUG.

FRANCE'S CONTINUING AFFAIR with high levels of unemployment has resulted in past reforms designed to provide more career-oriented education in universities.

However, universities are not the only options for post-graduate study facing graduating French high school students. An example of a popular alternative route is the often privately-funded Grandes Écoles, which are institutions where students prepare for careers in fields like engineering, commerce, civil servantry and industry. Unlike French universities, entrance into the • Student growth hasn't been proportional to the growth in teachers. For example, in the 1994-95 school year, the education system saw a five per cent growth in student numbers and only a 1.7 per cent draw in teachers. At Valenciennes, the student staff ratio was 1:28 in 1981 and grew to 1:86 in 1994.

— Le Monde, Oct. 1994

• A 1992 study in Le Monde de l'Éducation reported that 44 per cent of all arts students, and 42 per cent of all science students said that they were satisfied with the state of their university. The highest group of satisfied students were those in health with 65 per cent. However, 75 per cent of arts students, 76 per cent of science students were satisfied with the state of their teaching.

Grandes Écoles can be brutally competitive. Students must often enroll in two-year preparatory classes before seeking admission.

Another option could be to stay at the lycée for two extra years to get the Brevet de Technicien Supérieur, a diploma geared towards finding work in a technically-related field.

However, despite the plethora of options available for post-secondary personal enrichment, the overwhelming majority of French students are enrolled in university. How much of a majority? A 1995-96 study conducted by the office of the Ministre de l'Éducation Nationale revealed that, of the approximately 2,170,300 students enrolled in post-secondary education, 1,572,000 (72.4 per cent) are in university.

Why is this? According to Bonnavard, much of it has to do with the fact that, for most graduating "lycéens," access to university is relatively open. If students hold either a Baccalauréat Général or Technologique, there will be a spot for them in one of the universities, with access depending on several factors such as the type of Baccalauréat received and in some cases, registration numbers. Bonnavard attributes this relative "openness" to a fundamental belief in French culture that a university education should be accessible to all, saying that "instruction must be possible for everyone."

This belief is upheld by the country's students, according to Ludvine Pechoux, a first-year DEUG student in Art History and Archaeology. "Every one has the right to attend university," she said, adding that many students also choose university over other post-lycée options because of the relation of the subject areas offered to desired career paths.

The cost of attending, as well, is relatively low in comparison with Ontario rates and does not appear to deter students from pursuing higher education. Marie Odile Lanchard, a teacher at Lyon 2, estimated that the cost of university is approximately 2,000 francs for each year with costs varying per university.

While it appears that the fundamental right to a university education is something that both teachers and students alike wish to maintain, it has been identified by many to be one of the culprits for the variety of problems which continue to plague universities in France. Bonnavard claims that while he perceives the French university system to be one of high equality, there remains much to be desired. He cites a lack of teachers, a lack of space, a lack of means and insufficient funding as principal problems, which become all the more menacing as enrollment in French universities threatens to continue rising.

"What we have now is insufficient," he said. "These problems appear to be visible from the student point of view, as well. It's clear that many faculties need more money... there are not enough teachers for the number of students," said Pechoux.

PROBLEMS SUCH AS THE ONES expressed by Bonnard and Pechoux have long been a part of university life in France. It would be safe to assume that neither staff nor students have ever been shy about expressing their dissatisfaction. Wide-spread demonstrations regarding education in France can trace their roots all the way back to the 13th century foundation of the very first French universities when, according to the French newspaper Le Monde, massive student demonstrations served as a precursor to the completion of the constitution of what was then the University of Paris.

It could be said that "La manifestation" has evolved as a basic medium through which students communicate with their governmental power brokers. "[Demonstration] is the way to communicate with the government," said Pechoux, recalling a survey that was taken in the Lycées last year that revealed the dissatisfaction of the students regarding their learning conditions, yet was all but ignored by the upper level policy makers. "They don't listen, otherwise."

Bonnard echoes these sentiments from an administrative standpoint, calling student demonstrations a "way to show strength... to show that they have a collective voice, to show that their problems are serious."

"La manifestation" has played a key role in the development of the French higher education system from the 13th century until today. In fact, had it not been for the willingness of the French citizenry to protest, it is very likely that the French university system would not be organized as it is today.

IN MAY OF 1968, a massive General Strike was sparked by students at the University in Nanterre, a small school equipped for about 2,000 students facing registration numbers in the 20,000 range in October of 1967. The movement grew to a 1,000,000 people from all sectors of French society, all questioning the very "patriarchal" and "elitist" nature of French institutions at large.

Out of the upheaval of what is known today in France as simply "Mai 1968" came the framework upon which the universities of today are based with, among other things, a greater degree of individual independence, stronger links between teaching and research, and greater student involvement in the running of the school.

More recently, widespread protest regarding limited future access and growth discrepancies for the funding of France's universities took place throughout the country in November of 1995 putting hundreds of thousands of students on "strike." Since then, however, life on campus has been relatively quiet. But, the shadow cast by the Lycéen strikes looms in the background casting reminders of the past and promptings about the present.

And what of the future for France's universities? Past proposals have included the "Plan Universités 2000" put forward in 1990 with the initiative to physically prepare the country's anticipated university enrollment increases into the next century. Issues of the European integration have also been on the minds of policy makers as of late, with Claude Allègre announcing on May 25, 1998 the collective desire of France, Germany, Great Britain and Italy — affectionately known as the "Club des Quatre" — to harmonize, or "Europeanize" university diplomas, encourage students to study outside of their country's borders through the removal of financial and legal barriers and a broadening of student services across borders. "The objective is not to unify the system, but to propose a common framework," Allègre said in Le Monde.

October 21, 1998. Claude Allègre has proposed a reformed funding for France's Lycées. A partial victory for the country's high school students? Perhaps. But, there are few guarantees that the road ahead will not hold as many bumps as the one that they have already travelled.

Lanchard says that "the French university system stands apart from other systems due to its accessibility." Lanchard, herself, who does not come from a wealthy background, was able to attend university and become a teacher. Looking at the system's problems, however, its accessibility presents an intriguing argument against the ideal of open access to all.

Return to glory?

New blood leaves Queen's hockey teams optimistic

NEW SITE FOR CIAU INFO
There is a new, easy way to follow CIAU sports with the arrival of the online edition of Canadian University Sports Magazine. The web site, which is at www.cusmag.com, provides readers with detailed analysis of games, standings, links to campuses across the country and schedules for all CIAU sports. The magazine, which will come out in hard copy in late August, is edited by former Queen's varsity athlete and Sports Information officer Chris Stewart. If it is important to CIAU athletics, this is the place to find it.

BASKETBALL BABIES
After losing an arbitration case that nullified guaranteed contracts over the course of the lock-out, the NBA Players Union have vowed to fight back. The union's current course of action is to possibly decertify the union, which would allow for players currently under contract to be paid during the labour stoppage. Union chief Bill Hunter warns that this action will lead to a more prolonged stoppage. So, once again, labour unrest leaves one group of losers — the fans.

QUEEN'S SOCCER RULES
For the first time in memory, the Queen's Golden Gaels women's soccer team is number one in the CIAU polls. The team begins its run for the National championship, next weekend in Ottawa at the OUA Championships. The team finishes its season on Sunday at Richardson Stadium against Carleton at 3 p.m. They are immediately preceded by the men's game against Carleton, where the winner qualifies for the playoffs, the loser goes home.

CLEAN SWEEP
The New York Yankees won their 125th and final game of the 1998 season, which gave them a four game sweep of the San Diego Padres and the World Series crown. Scott Brosius, a journeyman third baseman, was named Series MVP. This is the 24th crown in the Yankees illustrious existence, the most in baseball history. Is this the best to do so?

IF CHRISTMAS CAME EARLY...
•The Nevada boxing commissioner would have to fight Mike Tyson and find out if he's really sane.
•San Diego Padre bullpen would hold a lead for more than a third of an inning.
•The Leafs would finally put the 'Cat' to sleep and get on with their season.

Men's hockey

By ADAM KAMINSKY

Talent and experience are two words usually associated with the teams that the Queen's hockey squad plays against in the OUA, but this season the tables will be turned.

With a talented group of returning players and the best recruiting class in memory, the Gaels have their most competitive outfit in recent history.

Starting with the forwards, the squad will have big guns Jonathan Bishop and Darcy O'Shea returning to anchor the first line. They will be joined up front by Rob Mailloux, who scored 55 goals with the Kingston Frontenacs, of the Ontario Hockey League, last season. The coaching staff is very excited about this recruit, because he is a calibre of player that traditionally overlooks the Gaels.

"He is one of the smartest players in the league and is a quiet leader for this team," remarked Assistant Coach Tim Cunningham. "It doesn't happen often that we get a guy like this in our program, so we are very excited."

While the first line looks to be promising, the forward depth for this season is exceptional. With centreman Jason Flynn and Jeff Scobie returning from strong seasons and, flanked by talented veterans like Alec St Louis, Paul Lang and Aaron Knight, the team looks to be able to control play with all four lines. Also joining the crew up front are first-year speedster Phil Lindsay and converted defenceman Matt Thorne.

"[Thorne] is a big, tough kid who does a good job of just standing in front of the net," explained Cunningham. "We expect him to score a lot of three-foot goals like [NHLer] Dave Andreychuk."

With the forward contingent looking impressive, it is hard to imagine that defence may be the strength of this team. With all six

Women's hockey

By ROBERT MACNEIL

Last season, the women's hockey team was plagued by poor goaltending and a weak defensive core. The defence was so inconsistent that Co-coaches Diana Drury and Jacques Tremblay had to put some of their best forwards on the blueline in order to shore-up this weakness. As a result, the team's offence struggled. This year, with the addition of three rookie goaltenders, five rookie defencemen and the star forwards back up front, the Gaels are set to compete for a playoff spot.

Coach Drury's main goal starting last season was to recruit goaltending talent to Queen's. In recognition of her efforts, the team had five goalies try out in camp this fall, including four rookies. By the end of camp, the Gaels had decided on three rookies to handle the duties. At this point it is too early to tell who will be number one behind the pipes, but Drury and Tremblay face the same situation as Maple Leafs head coach Pat Quinn does — more than one great goalie and only one position. After suffering last season, this "problem" is the best thing that could have happened to the Gaels.

"We will not be intimidated this year. We don't care who [our opponents] are, just bring it on."
— Co-coach Diana Drury

Jenevieve Hupe and Claudia Tom are the two main contenders for the starting job. Hupe, a Toronto native, was wined and dined by Drury last season. She made several visits to Kingston and was convinced that Queen's provided the best hockey program and educational environment. Tom was living in British Columbia and was recruited by Drury over the phone. Having only statistics to go on, Drury asked her to come down to Kingston and, so far, it has turned out to be a brilliant move. Backing up these players is Catherine Shaw. She was thrilled to be named to the team and will fill in if the injury bug strikes Hupe or Tom.

As every coach knows, how

Brand new expectations

By NEATE SAGER

With several improvements, the Queen's men's basketball team hopes this season will erase the memory of last year's frustrating campaign.

Head coach Scott Meeson, now in his third season at the helm, is confident his squad can attain a playoff berth in the competitive OUA East division. "We're looking at a veteran squad to really lead this team," he said. "These guys play well together, they've come to know each other's strengths and weaknesses."

Last season, Meeson stated, should be seen as trial preceding triumph, since the Gaels were overwhelmed by a combination of unfortunate circumstances. "We struggled at focusing on the present [because] we were always looking ahead or behind ourselves. Barring injuries, we likely would've been in the playoffs last season."

At the forefront of the drive to the playoffs is a nucleus of reliable veterans, including forward Derek Richardson, who has paced the Tricolour in scoring for two consecutive seasons. Fellow forward Peter Stelter, returning for his fifth year of eligibility, will be asked to take a larger role in bringing about a successful season for the Gaels. Stelter, renowned for his perimeter shooting, will be asked to lend more rebounding muscle this season, collaborating with centre John Purdy to give the undersized Gaels an intimidating presence on the boards. In the backcourt, the Gaels will start Mike Gleeson and Brendan Byrne, who is attempting a return from reconstructive knee surgery.

Providing bench strength is a blend of veterans and promising recruits. Back for another campaign are forwards Mark Bednis and Rob Sharard, and guards Dave Wilson and Reilly Musselman. Joining the fold are a trio of impressive rookies: forward Duncan Cowan, Kingston-native Jay Fraser, and guard and swingman Brett Walking of Dundas — a player Meeson describes as "a tremendous leaper."

Clearly enamoured of his team's potential, Meeson raves that "we've got some athletes this year... you'll see a mixture of experienced veterans and talented rookies." Meeson added that the remainder of the exhibition schedule will serve to uncover a substitution pattern that will adequately utilize the whole of the team's personnel.

Crunch time

By ADAM KAMINSKY

The Queen's Golden Gaels football team, reeling after two consecutive defeats, will be making the long trip up to Quebec City's P.E.P.S. Stadium to take on the Laval Rouge et Or this weekend in hopes of regaining their winning form.

Having fallen from first to a tie for third place, the Gaels (3-3) have no choice but to make their first visit to Quebec City a successful one.

Laval's Rouge et Or (3-4) have had a roller coaster season and are coming off of a 26-21 loss at McGill last weekend. Laval has been ranked as high as sixth in the CIAU after a huge win against Bishop's, but were beaten at home by Carleton in the same week and have yet to regain their form. It is this inconsistency that concerns the Gaels' coaching staff.

"You're not quite sure who is going to show up for [Laval]," said Head Coach Bob Howes. "If you play well and stay consistent you have a good chance of jumping on opportunities and winning."

The Laval offence does not intimidate defensive coordinators as they rank fifth in the conference, averaging 360 yards per game. The strength of their attack lies in a running back by committee and a strong passing game, led by quarterback Francois Chapdelaine. The Laval offence also features game-breaking wide receiver Robby Desrosiers, who for the season has caught 23 balls for 351 yards.

The Laval defence benefited from the two high-scoring Ottawa-Queen's games and emerged as the number one rated unit in the conference. On average the Rouge et Or allow only 303 yards per game and are equally adept against the run and pass. They are led by fifth-year all-conference defensive back Bernard Gravel who plays like a linebacker against the run and a safety against the pass. Laval's pass rush includes two of the top five sack men in the O-QIFC — Huges Beauchamp and F. Pepe Esposito.

The Gaels will counter Laval's top-rated defence with the second-ranked offence in the conference, averaging 447 yards per game. Quarterback Beau Howes is second in the conference in passing and he has two receivers, James MacLean and Jason Wimmer, who are in the top five in yardage. The running game, led by Paul Correale, came to life during last week's loss, but has been inconsistent all season. Fullback Chris Robyn, a devastating blocker, has had some success running inside traps in recent weeks, keeping the defenders on their heels.

"We are trying to maintain a run-pass balance, which should allow us to use play-action passing when the field gets sloppy," said Howes.

On defence, Coach Bob Mullen's troops, who were bombarded by Ottawa's superior offensive talent, should be able to regain their early season form against Laval. The two losses dropped the unit from first in the O-QIFC to fourth, allowing 345 yards per game, but the Gaels' defence is better than that.

"[The defence] should have better match-ups against Laval, because they don't have the superior fire power that Ottawa had," explained the fourth-year head coach.

Lions Ave. on CFRX 101.7 FM. Pregame 12:30 p.m.

In the end, this game could turn on special teams, one of Laval's greatest strengths. Gravel is one of the most consistent kickers in the league, which allows Laval to cover up for some offensive weakness. Their return game features Daniel Fleury as the best punt returner in the conference. The coverage teams for the Gaels have been good most of the year and Beau Howes shows glimpses of being an excellent punter. Queen's cannot lose the special teams battle if they want to win this game.

This game is a must win for the Gaels, falling to 3-4 would be disastrous, and with Bishop's the last game on their schedule it could push them out of the playoffs.

This game is even more significant for Laval — if they lose they are officially eliminated from the playoffs.

"This is a huge game for us and a huge game for them, both teams need a win on Sunday," said Coach Howes.

Laval is feeling the pressure and is tough at home, but lack the talent to beat a Queen's team that played Ottawa close. It remains to be seen if the Gaels can refocus, forget about the Gee-Gees and get back to old form. In all likelihood they will.

Gaels look to improve

By NEIL ACHARYA

It is a good bet that the Queen's women's varsity volleyball team will be in high gear when the season kicks off October 30, at the University of Toronto. The women's squad has already participated in two tournaments at McGill and Brock, where they placed a strong second both times. They are entering their third tournament in as many weeks this weekend at the 12th Queen's Invitational Championships. The team hopes to better their performance from last year when they fell to Laurier in the bronze medal game.

When asked about her thoughts on the upcoming season, Head Coach Lisa Evles seemed encouraged by her team's strong showing so far. "It's going to be a tough east [OUA east division], but with hard work I feel being in the top two is attainable," she said.

When looking to the OUA championships being held in late February at the University of Ottawa, the team hopes to better their results from previous championship tournaments. "Over the past three seasons we've finished fourth in our conference and eighth in the OUA championships. This year we look to contend for a medal at the championships," commented Eyles.

The team is calling on its veteran players to help them this year. Lindsay Barrett is a transfer student from UBC, where she played three years as a power hitter under current national team coach Doug Reiner. Fourth-year players Karrie Bauke, who plays power along with Barrett, and middle blocker Lael Pitteau are co-captains of the squad. The starting positions are rounded out by middle blocker Kristine Spekkens and talented setter Julie Macmillan. Erin Blair is the right side player for the Gaels.

With such so much experience and talent taking to the court for this year's edition of the Gaels, improvement is certainly in the cards. For the 1998/99 squad, a little work should go a long way.

Restaurant Review

You don't have to be Greek to enjoy an evening of delicious Greek delicacies, accompanied by the traditional music of Greece playing in the background. Just wander down to Greco's Grill and Wine Bar at 169 Princess Street, Kingston.

Owned and operated by the Kolinis family, the restaurant is small, but it is warm and cosy. Pictures of their Greek homeland decorate the walls, along with beautiful plants and several small trees lit up at night with tiny bulbs. Usually when eating out, I like to have good friends along for a second opinion and because we can all order a variety of foods to try. This evening I am accompanied by my husband Marco and two very close family friends, Marianne and Roy.

After ordering a bottle of Inskillen Pinot Noir, our waiter, Stewart, brought a basket of fresh garlic bread and a crunchy flat bread covered with sesame seeds (Baked on the premises). A tasty salmon spread is served with the bread. For appetizers we tried the marinated octopus falso (also prepared in the kitchen and very delicious) and the Saganaki. Saganaki is a square of tangy cheese that the waiter will flame at your table. For those who have sworn off salt, it is a cheese, but tasty. The flambe causes the cheese to be crusty on the outside and creamy on the inside. Having eaten at Greco's a number of times, I find it very difficult to pass up the Gourmet Chicken. It is fantastic, but this evening they are preparing for the Chicken in Puff Pastry, a similar dish and equally delicious (It's not on the menu, but it is offered occasionally as a special.) After a little arm twisting, we got the recipe for you to try at home.

Marco and Roy both ordered the grilled lamb chops. I don't think they could resist them. Marianne ordered the garlic shrimp platter served on a bed of rice. They looked wonderful. All this food went down nicely with a bottle of Mondavi Cabernet Sauvignon. After the meal, we were so full that we did not want to hear the word "dessert," so instead we enjoyed a coffee, accompanied by a warmed brandy. Don't be afraid of breaking the bank at Greco's. Prices are very reasonable, especially for the quality of the cuisine. On the dinner menu, appetizers such as Tzatziki, Carpaccio and Bruschetta are priced from $2.95 through $9.95. Entrees are priced from $8.50 to $13.95 including items like the Chicken Parmesan, Filet Mignon and Rack of Lamb. For fish and seafood lovers, Rainbow Trout, Filet of Salmon and the Poseidon's Platter, are priced from $9.95 to $14.95. The menu also features a selection of pasta dishes and a variety of gourmet pizzas. Wine lovers won't be disappointed either, a wide selection of wines are available from Greece, California, Italy, Chile, Australia and Ontario.

ATHLETES OF THE WEEK

Running away with accolades

Male

For the fourth time in his illustrious Queen's athletic career, Bob McGill is The Queen's Journal Athlete of the Week.

The veteran long-distance runner placed first in a cross-country race at RMC, covering the 10k of rocky terrain in an impressive 32 minutes and 46 seconds. McGill was happy to win, but felt even better about doing it in Kingston.

"It was nice to have the home crowd watching," said the fourth-year English major. "I was able to enjoy the run and smile most of the way."

While individual wins are exciting, McGill, who is captain of the squad, is focusing on team achievement.

"Being captain has pulled me out of my self-centredness as a runner and now every race is less of a personal challenge and more of a team challenge," he said.

The team is now ranked fourth in the CIAU national rankings and is beginning to bear down for the up-coming OUA championships in Windsor.

"[Earlier in the year] at the Western Open we finished third, close behind Windsor and Guelph, and it should be the same three teams at the OUAs," said the veteran runner. "We are the underdogs in many peoples eyes, but we have a good shot at taking them down."

With four of seven runners back from last season's squad and a solid group of rookies, the team is really beginning to take shape.

"Hopefully we can recapture the form we had two years ago when we won a silver at the CIAUs, but first we need to run in Windsor," said McGill.

This being his fourth time running in the championships, McGill seems to be focused and not feeling the pressure.

"Psychologically, it is just another race, not a bigger race," he explained.

While he is not putting pressure on himself, there are high expectations for this team.

"Given our ability level, an adequate performance wins us a medal and an exceptional performance wins us the gold," predicted McGill.

If last week is an indication, the team looks to be heading in the right direction.

Playing perfect tennis

Female

As the women's tennis team heads into the playoffs this weekend, one of their guiding lights is on cruise control. Second-year veteran and Assistant Coach Paula Myslivecek has been named the OUA Athlete of the Week and is this week's Queen's Journal Athlete of the Week.

In her two years at Queen's, Myslivecek has been named OUA Athlete of the Week twice, and Queen's Journal Athlete of the Week three times. This is largely due to the fact that she has not lost a match since she has been here.

Before arriving at Queen's, this Kingston native honed her talent south of the border at Rice University in Texas. When she was a child, she learned the game of tennis from her father who has been a great influence on her life. Beyond just playing and coaching the Gaels team, Myslivecek also coaches and plays at the Match Point tennis club here in Kingston.

This year's Gaels, according to their assistant coach "have more experience [and] have developed their game more." In describing the team's enthusiasm, Myslivecek feels that "the girls are pretty hungry [and if we] play like we're playing [now], we will have a very good chance."

This weekend at the OUA championships Myslivecek will have another opportunity to defend her unbeaten record.

Playoff dreams

defencemen back from last season's third-place team (including Thorne), and the addition of former Soo Greyhound Wes Booker, the defence corps is stacked. Captain Scott Richardson is back for his fourth year to lead the group and he will be ably assisted by tough-guy Damien Gilbert, smooth-skating Dave Wilson, and fiery Charlie Clark. This unit will not only be able to protect the goal, it will have the ability to join the rush, as well as provide quality shots and decisions from the point.

The last line of defence for the Gaels this year has also improved over the last few seasons with the addition of goaltender Jason Skilnick. Skilnick, who played on a Brandon Wheat Kings team that won the Memorial Cup, provides Queen's with not only the skill of a Major Junior goalie, but also the confidence.

"He is a great athlete and has provided us with a great improvement in [goaltending]," said Cunningham. "He also makes [back-up goalie] Kevin Dunbar that much better."

In addition to the wealth of talent that begins the season, the coaching staff is eagerly awaiting the eligibility of centre Dave Galow, a former full-scholarship player at Northern Michigan. He is ineligible to play until mid-way through the season because of CIAU transfer rules, but he is already practicing with the team.

"When he joins this team, he will be one of the best players in the league," said Cunningham. "It will be like adding a player at the trading deadline in the pros. He will add a spark in a long [26-game] regular season."

Going into a season with this much talent and excitement is new to this group of Queen's coaches and players, but they remain modest in their goals.

"We just hope to be better than we were last year," said Head Coach Chris MacDonald. "So many teams in this league get so many new players, we never know what to expect."

After two straight seasons falling in the first-round of the playoffs to the University of Toronto, it can be expected that this group will exceed last season's performance and they could very well exceed even their own wildest dreams.

Goalie goldmine

ever, goalies are only as good as the defence placed in front of them. Returning for a third year is assistant captain Colleen MacDonald. Her task will be to help guide the new rookies and provide them with a role model.

As the Gaels get ready to embark on another campaign, their confidence is at an all-time high.

This crop of fresh talent includes Stephanie McMillan and Amy Rose. Both players have strong shots and are quite intelligent when it comes to seeing the ice well. The rock of the defence is newcomer Heather Brackly, who is Hape's former teammate from Toronto. At 5 feet 9 inches and 180 pounds, she will be the solid defenceman that the Gaels have been lacking in past seasons.

Since the team is on a solid defensive foundation, last year's blueliners are able to return up front and concentrate on putting the puck in the net. Andrea Millard will add a welcome burst of offence, as will team captain Lori Lofthus. Assistant captain Sarah Reid, who Drury describes as "feisty as hell," is a natural goal scorer. Drury feels that she will provide leadership off the ice as she always wants to work out and log extra practice time on the ice.

As the Gaels get ready to embark on another campaign, their confidence is at an all-time high. The team is facing the mighty University of Toronto in their opener this weekend, and Drury is quite emphatic about her team's chances. "We will not get smoked this year [and] we will not be intimidated this year. We don't care who [our opponents] are, just bring it on," says Drury. In her opinion, the Gaels have reloaded enough that they should be one of the top four teams in the league.

Improved talent

Mindful that his team's nemesis last season was athletic, pressing opponents, Meeson asserts the Gaels are now better equipped to defuse pressure defenses. "We've seen two good presses in pre-season, and we've handled them well," he said.

Meeson was pleased by the large crowd in attendance at Bartlett Gymnasium last Friday for the team's exhibition season opener against Dawson College, which Queen's won 81-71. "It certainly motivates the players. We're building a following, and that's very important for the program."

He also predicted the Gaels' playoff hopes are contingent on their winning the vast majority of their home contests: "We need to take care of business on our floor. That's where we can better control things."

Improving on last season's 6-14 record will be no easy feat. "Our schedule will be one of the toughest in the country," predicted Meeson.

Colin James and the Little Big Band re-introduce swing to Kingston

CONCERT REVIEW
Colin James and the Little Big Band
AJ's Hangar
Wednesday, October 21

By JIM WHITTINGTON

Colin James and the Little Big Band rolled their "Full Swing Tour" into Kingston Wednesday night and left an absolutely awestruck audience in their wake. James lived up to his billing as one of Canada's best entertainers, wowing a packed AJ's Hangar.

The evening opened with East Coast swingers "Johnny Favourite Swing Orchestra," who nearly blasted the roof of AJ's with their explosive horn section while lead singer Favourite crooned his way into the hearts of the audience. Their set was highlighted by their classic swing lounge sound, and a unique version of Led Zepelin's "Black Dog" that had the

The set ended with an extended version of "Bringing Down the House" which James slammed out with authority.

Fred and Jane were on hand for a little swing dance instruction to help those of us out with two-left feet, but the place was just too packed, and it was pretty tough to test out some of the steps. Anyway, who cares it was all just filler for the big show to come. Colin James took to the stage kickin' it like James Brown to the soulful horns of his band, and the screams of middle-aged women. He quickly whipped the audience into a frenzy, playing hits from his current album, Colin James and his Little Big Band II which included stunning versions of "Jump from Six to Six" and "Lets Shout."

He continued to electrify the elated crowd with old favourites from his first Little Big Band Album before he decided to slow things down and in his own words, "light up a reefer and get sleazy." "Satellite" highlighted a dark excursion into slow grinding swing that sent the audience into a mellow groove. James stepped up the pace a couple of songs later with a largely improvisational version of "Triple Shot" that allowed each member of his stellar band to strut their stuff. He grinned from ear to ear as his band breezed through feats of sonic amazement, thrilling the crowd with the kind of musical skill most of us just dream of. However, James upstaged them all with his fiery guitar playing that would make Stevie Ray Vaughn's jaw hit the floor.

Every bit the showman, James played up to the crowd at every opportunity. Leaping all over the stage and speakers with his axe blazing, James stirred the crowd's involvement in old favourites like "Surely," while he joked around with his bandmates, and egged them on while they cut loose on their solos. You could tell these guys were just having a blast on stage, and were happy to let the audience in on their fun.

The set ended with an extended version of "Bringing Down the House" which James slammed out with authority. AJ's roared with approval and the bar shook from above as the crowd began their encore stomp. James returned to the stage to the delight of onlookers, and broke into a John Lee Hooker-ish boogie woogie guitar playing before he swung into a four-song encore ending with "Cadillac Woman."

The only thing that pissed me off about the night was the lack of Queen's representation in the crowd. I mean students are always bitching that they see the same crap day in and day out here (i.e. Spirit of the West and other perennial acts), and yet when something new brighter's Kingston stages they are nowhere to be found.

Colin James and the Little Big Band quite possibly put on the best show I have ever seen in Kingston, and I don't think there's anyone who saw the show that would disagree with me. The combination of good fun, unbelievable sound, and an intimate setting made this a hell of a night. It too bad everyone couldn't make it because Colin James and the Little Big Band was the biggest thing to hit Kingston in a long time.

Robert Atyeo
Heart Like A Rubber Ball
Drog Records

By TODD JACKSON

There are a lot of really bad singer-songwriters currently putting out CDs. Robert Atyeo isn't one of them.

In "Floatin' & Hummin'," Atyeo paints a picture of love hiding in the corner scared to come into the light.

Atyeo's first work in four years is laid on the same foundations as his critically acclaimed Angels on a Cliff. Again, he floods the new recording with sex, love, and death — cast in the playful and brutal light which has become his trademark. Atyeo shines when he explores the absurdities of life — the way love pulls you in to stroke you with one hand and smack you around with the other, and the way knowing death is near can comfort you with a sense of closure, lying there waiting to answer all your questions. Atyeo writes about this confusion from a well judged distance. He pulls back just enough to get a good look at his experiences without losing focus on what's important. He recognizes that love is a wealth of contradictions but it still keeps him up at night.

While Atyeo's style remains, the new album is not a sequel to his last, Angels on a Cliff, which is an album driven by a strong sense of restlessness. On the new CD, Heart Like A Rubber Ball his perspective has shifted. I get the sense that his new CD was written with a greater sense of calm. On track number three, "Slappin'," he sings "Won't you please stop that slappin' me around — isn't it enough that you've got me on the ground." I think that Atyeo is losing patience for the turmoil. In "Floatin' & Hummin'," Atyeo paints a picture of love hiding in the corner scared to come into the light, ashamed to show its face. I think Atyeo just wants to give love a break.

For the most part this is straight-up folk music. Front and centre is Atyeo's voice and guitar. Joining him is Brian Griffiths also on guitar, occasionally Paul Panchezak on percussion and Dino Verginella on bass. A handful of others sit in on different tracks — notably Stephen Fearing who adds his guitar work to "Slappin'." Tannis Slimmon who sang on Angels also lends her haunting harmonies to this recording.

This is contemporary Canadian roots music which is representative of the great writing which is too often missed.

Heart Like A Rubber Ball is well worth a listen. This is contemporary Canadian roots music which is representative of the great writing which is too often missed. Robert Atyeo has once again secured himself as an important figure in the Canadian folk music portrait.

Johnny Favourite Swing Orchestra
Holiday Romance
Alert Music Inc.

By ANDREW LIMMERT

One of this year's least-predictable phenomena in popular music has been the reemergence of swing orchestras as a force in the music industry. It could be traced to a variety of different sources, but you can point your finger at a few possibilities in particular. Maybe it was in response to a general malaise towards the stagnant realm of top-40 alterna-rock and R&B. Maybe today's youth identifies swing with The Gap's commercial for khakis. The popular movie Swingers also featured a few tunes. But from whatever the source, it is clear that swing is steadily reclaiming a firm fan base, which is pretty good for a genre of music that has been dormant since the 1950s.

The Johnny Favourite Swing Orchestra is just one of the young bands which is redefining this lost art. Hailing from Halifax, the orchestra's new release, Holiday Romance, is quickly gaining acclaim from swing fans across Canada. Since the release of their first album on a major label, Johnny Favourite is anticipating international fame.

In short, the album is a fully-danceable compilation of 15 original tunes and covers at a variety of different tempos. Oh yeah, and after a few songs, you get the uncontrollable urge to jump out of your seat and spin your partner around the dance floor.

The 12 piece band is naturally charming. Johnny Favourite (a.k.a. Stuart Bastow) is a born crooner, showing off his heptat charisma and slick voice in every track. John Wesley Chisholm is the man behind the Orchestra's arrangement and playful lyrics, bringing a very romantic and proudly

Where's the craft-manship?

Prepare to toil through Practical Magic

MOVIE REVIEW

By JESSE CRAIG BELLINGER

Take a splash of your stereotypical image of a witch, blend in too much in demand actresses, mix well and let stand. Boil for two excruciatingly boring hours, remove from burner. Add undefined, but equal amounts of romantic comedy, farce, melodrama, fantasy and supernatural science-fiction. Stir well and taste. Garnish with eclectic assortment of aging actors, cure children and several generic-looking men. Sprinkle with minuscule amounts of special effects (be careful! you don't want to rake away from the dangerously-weak plot or one-dimensional characters with too much action!), allow time to cool and chant the appropriate trite English-language spell and Presto! You've got the recipe for a truly terrible movie.

Practical Magic fails in every way a movie can fail; it is vapid, lifeless, demeaning and derogatory while presenting a veneer of flattery to the very subjects that it disrespects. I know some women, I even know some witches; I can't imagine either being remotely interested in this film.

Practical Magic does not exactly re-enforce stereotypes regarding said groups; it outright evades them. It has been said that the worst insult that one can receive is non-acknowledgement; at no point in Practical Magic does the film take anything that resembles a position, even in the usual, fluffy hegemony-reinforcing way that most major studio productions do. These witches are eccentric, fun-loving and (ironically) very impractical. They are feared and despised by their fellow townspeople and appear unable to interact with them in a constructive manner. Whether this is unfairly due to the townpeople's prejudices is a moot point — it effects Sally (Sandra Bullock) to the point where she is willing to abandon witchcraft for the possibility of living a "normal" life.

Such inconsiderate treatment of significant issues is precisely what is wrong with this film. Witches and their craft are treated as a novelty and their magic is frequently used as the set up for cheap one-liners and sight gags. Kidman and Bullock are given nothing to work with and respond, appropriately, with the kind of worn-out and redundant performances that financially successful actors mail in when they accept such second-rate scripts (Speed 2 or Days of Thunder, anyone?). When Aunt Jet and Aunt Frances (Dianne Wiest and Stockard Channing, respectively, who supply the only decent acting in the movie) leave the sisters part way through the film in an effort to teach their nieces how to "clean up their own mess," I had nothing but heartfelt sympathy for them. If only I could get up and walk out of this film with them, I thought. However, my respect for the aunts' intelligence was short-lived — not only do they return, but from their re-entry on, they appear unnaturally determined to act just as terribly as every other actor in the film — and they do.

The script constantly lets its characters down, as it is not dark enough to be menacing, not sincere enough to be dramatic and not nearly thoughtful enough to be romantic. Domestic abuse, hastily-buried corpses, the death of a spouse, a malevolent and vindictive ghost, and prejudice are somehow mixed into a film that calls itself a romantic comedy without ever taking any sort of position on these issues. Perhaps director Griffin Dunne is expressing something by judiciously excluding commentary regarding these unpleasant facets of the film. Much more likely, based upon the wildly uneven nature of the film, is that Dunne simply neglected to take up screenwriters Akiva Goldsman and Adam Brooks on these major flaws in the film's script. What else are we supposed to think when detective Gaty Hallet (Aiden Quinn) overlooks Sally's admission of murdering a man despite her tape-recorded confession and decides to close the case? Clearly, this film could use a little magic; sadly, no one in the film is capable of conjuring up even the most feeble of spells.

If you want to see a dark, pseudo-Gothic film characterized by quirky direction and interesting performances, go out and rent Tim Burton's Edward Scissorhands, which accomplishes everything that Practical Magic fails to do: make sense, have a sensible plot, be entertaining. If you're wondering how a film could exist without even meeting these minimal requirements, you may get some kind of enjoyment out of Practical Magic; otherwise, skip this one. There's more enchantment in a box of "Black Magic" than is to be found in this film.

Canadian point of view to the big-band scene. The two front-men are joined by a talented group of musicians, including a seven-piece horn section, drums, double bass, and piano. Unfortunately, soon after the recording was completed, Chisholm was forced to leave the band for undisclosed reasons. He has been replaced with touring guitarist Brad Contad.

Just don't think about the fact that your grandparents probably danced to the same stuff.

Among the highlights of Holiday Romance is the lead-off single, "Rootbeer and Licorice," a fun and fast-paced dance tune with a few touches of Charleston and some crazy saxophone work. The title track is just as high-energy — you will find yourself swinging your head and snapping your fingers along to the beat in no time.

"We Still Talk" and "Hard 8" jazz it up a few notches, with a snappy beat and bursts of horns and piano.

"Postcards From Paris" and "Molly Marlane" slow the tempo down a bit, with some solid big-band ballroom music and almost sickeningly-sweet sentimentalism.

"Canadian September" gives the album a good down-home flavour. But the best track by far is their cover of Led Zeppelin's "Black Dog"; it is truly unbelievable how well the song works with horns and a swing beat.

What can we say about swing's growing popularity among young people? Well, it's a hell of a lot healthier than a lot of other "young" music out there. Swing represents a lifestyle which may not be completely wholesome, but zoot suits look good, the music sounds great, and who wouldn't go for an excuse to drink martini and dance cheek to cheek with your partner of choice?

Maybe I am being optimistic, but it seems to me that in a time of Marilyn Manson's and Puff Daddy's, Johnny Favourite and his friends show the MTV generation a whole other side of the party.

You just have to have a bit of style, a spring in your step, and an open mind, baby. Just don't think about the fact that your grandparents probably danced to the same stuff.

Genre-wise, their sound leans toward the harder side of alternative, although they never compromise musicality for loudness or tempo.

For being only a three member group, Eve 6 impressively incorporates a variety of complicated time and chord changes into their songs. This manages to give each piece a unique sound despite the group's somewhat limited instrumental lineup.

The most famous song to date is the first release "Inside Out." It demonstrates both the band's token bass rhythm and the free association-esque lyrics that are predominant throughout the album.

"Leech" is another solid effort with similar sounds to the first release. A more temperate song, "Jesus Nitelite," is slow and thoughtful. In this piece, the musical arrangement is reminiscent of the song "What Is This Love" by Blue Rodeo.

Eve 6 is a solid album of diverse songs. Despite the limited selection of instruments, the composition and engineering of the songs is spectacular. For a debut effort, Eve 6 should certainly be commended.

Unlike some music groups who struggle for years for radio/video air play, Eve 6 has exploded on to the charts with relatively few hardship years behind them — they have made themselves heard in the music industry with their debut, self-titled album.

No fight in Irish Exhibit lacking in realism

ART REVIEW

By DALIA TUBIS

Bill Irish presents his Canadian landscapes at the Edward Day Gallery.

Those who are fatigued from trying to comprehend the dominant art form of the day random splashes of colour on odd materials will find some little, very little, relief in the art of Bill Irish.

Though by no means beautiful (actually far from it) what is most interesting about this art that depicts Canadian landscapes is not the actual paintings but the short stories that accompany each work. These stories, or what Irish calls "suggestions," are typically a paragraph that describes some of the people that Irish suggests might have been on each particular landscape. These stories add some life to the pictures, but not enough to completely resurrect them. The painter makes an attempt to create realistic landscapes, but his technique fails him. Irish uses the technique of "glazing," a system where most of the paint is kept transparent so the light will travel through the paint to bounce off the white ground or base. On its way back through the paint the light apparently adds some brilliance and shine to the colour, making the picture seem almost three dimensional. Unfortunately, this also makes the paintings seem unrealistic, even eerie at times.

Irish's painting Princeton Falls might have been a beautiful picture with its rolling hills sprinkled with bright yellow flowers and a winding path traveling through the landscape, but the excess shine from the "glaze" only makes the lovely subject seem unnatural.

However, Irish work is effective when he attempts to depict nature as it actually appears. For example, in some pieces Irish paints series of mountain ranges that are discernable and effectively convey his often clouded messages; the beauty and majestic qualities of the Canadian landscape.

Unfortunately, until all of Irish's work has a semblance of realism, it will not be fit to be hung in the Metropolitan Museum of Art or the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Living dead Studio 102 show grooves

BY ALISTAIR FORBOS

It's time to trip the light fantastic and take a time warp back to the seventies. Bringing it all back home by Terence McNally is being performed, in colour, at Studio 102 tonight and tomorrow. The play is a satirical look at a stereotypical family in the 1970s, who are dealing with their eldest son returning home from the Vietnam war in a coffin. The play provides a disturbing, yet at times, light hearted depiction of the era. It brings to question the timeless saying: "Boy wouldn't it have been fun to live in that decade!"

Ariel Goldblatt, director of Bringing it all back home, has created a window through which we can see into the life of a family from a different era. Each character in the play is an exaggerated cliché of the decade. The brother (Lucas Costello) and sister (Meg Logue) constantly fight throughout the show and when they do manage to talk reasonably for a few moments, it's either about drugs or sex. The father, played by Geoff Johnson, is a loud and rather obnoxious man. The mother (Sasha Webster) fits right in with the overstated stereotypes, as she is a somewhat petty housewife. These static characters, along with the sporadic appearance of the dead son (Andrew Owen) and a hilarious, yet beautiful TV journalist (Anthony Farrell) create a comically absurd situation that also paints a bleak and cynical picture of families in the 1970s.

The setting for this production is a perfect backdrop for the performance. Lava lamps, hanging beads and plastic wrapped conches epitomize the groovy style of this set. The costumes are no less than fantastic with their casual look of mismatched colours. The lighting of this show adds to the play's dramatic theme while at the same time enhancing the colourful 1970s setting.

While the show was a satirical view of the era, the absurd personalities of the characters, sometimes seemed to reach a point where they became unrealistic. For example, the way the characters would discuss mundane topics in front of the body of their dead family member as though it was not there, made it difficult for me to continue suspending my disbelief. Aside from that, the show was highly entertaining.

I believe it's time for everybody to dabble in a little groove and take the time to see this play — you won't regret it.

"Someone with a human touch" continues: Ex-Ginger Spice, a.k.a Geri Halliwell, began her first day as a U.N. goodwill ambassador last Tuesday. Her job description includes promoting awareness of reproductive health issues in Third World countries for the UN Population Fund. Thank you very much.

Buffy the "feminist" slayer: Don't call television's Buffy Sarah Michelle Gellar a feminist. The 21-year-old actress stated in next week's USA Weekend, "I hate the word. Do I consider myself a strong female individual? Uh-huh. Can I take care of myself? Yeah sure." Gellar also refuses to be reminded she made People Magazine's "50 Most Beautiful People" list stating that she isn't another "cute little blond actress." Whatever.

C'mon baby, say that you love me: Singer Gloria Estefan makes her film debut opposite Meryl Streep in 50 Violins. Estefan will portray the friend and co-worker to Streep's character. Streep plays Roberta Izavaras, a violinist who teaches East Harlem youngsters the art of the string.

Fueling artists Local artists auction their talent

ART AUCTION PREVIEW

BY DIMITRIOS TSOTOS

Every year students flock to the Imagnus sale in the JDUC to purchase posters to cover their bare walls in a very lame attempt at home decoration. Fluffy kittens, works of long-dead, famous artists, and movie posters from every pop-culture hit dating back to the seventies may seem hip to uninspired students who want only to put some colour, any colour, up on their bare, white walls.

It appears as if the picture were put through a pastel filter, blurring and obscuring the colouring and edges.

However, more sophisticated, and much cooler alternatives available to styled students who demand that there be an element of substance to their home decor. Such an alternative is coming up this Saturday, with Kingston Artists Association's 16th annual art auction.

Up for auction are 77 works by local artists, including Queen's students and professors, ranging in style from classic landscape watercolors to computer generated art, as well as sculptures, photography, mixed media and found art (a kind of mixed media art constructed from discarded scraps).

The prices of the works range from $50 to $750. The proceeds from the auction are split between the Association and the artists.

Started in the early seventies, the Association created one of the first artist-run centres in the area. The art center allows local artists to control their art and have a venue to showcase their works. The centre also provides a place for artists to interact creatively with each other.

It is not necessary to purchase anything at the auction. Students can use the auction as an opportunity to appreciate some of the work done by local talent. I personally had the opportunity to get a sneak-peek at the works being put up for auction. Many of the pieces showed great talent. I was personally impressed by the photography of Queen's Professor George Clark, and the computer generated images from Peter Hodkinson's Lady Bug series. My favourite piece is George Clark's "The Hero's Farm a Thousand Years After." I have no experience in photography, but it appears as if the picture were put through a pastel filter, blurring and obscuring the colouring and edges. A close examination of the piece reveals that it is a photograph, but from a distance it appears to be a very realistic painting. This work suggests to me that there is a thin veil between perception and reality and that our relative positioning in space and time influences how we see and understand the world around us.

The auction will take place at the Grand Theatre. (Box Office: 530-2050). There is a $5 admission charge.

Along with the auction, there will be a viewing and hors d'oeuvres from 6:30 - 8 p.m. with the actual auction starting at 8 p.m. and running until 10 p.m.

For those that wish to view the art before auction night, it can be viewed until Friday at Modern Fuel Gallery, which is located at 21-A Queen Street.

The Gallery is open from 12 - 4:30 p.m. For further information, one of the art coordinators can be reached at the Gallery, at 548-4883.

Meds declare increased need

BY ALEXANDRA DYER

Faced with dramatic tuition increases, the number of requests for bursaries and OSAP made by Queen's medical students has increased this year.

According to Pat Bogstad at Student Awards, there has been "increased interest in bursaries this year by all students, with a large number of inquiries coming from medical students."

Bogstad said Student Awards received 104 bursary applications from Queen's medical students, which represents approximately 35 per cent of the faculty. Sixty-eight per cent of first-year medical students also applied for bursaries, she said.

"I'd be quite sure of myself if I said that this is a higher percentage than last year," she said.

"Anyone who applies for a bursary and who has a need will get some assistance," Bogstad said, however, he could not guarantee that applicants will get the full amount they applied for.

There has also been increased demand for OSAP by medical students. "Fifty-six per cent of medical students applied for OSAP this year," Bogstad said, adding that this figure does not account for the out-of-province medical students who are ineligible for OSAP.

For first-year Queen's medical students, tuition stands at $6,748 and will increase to approximately $9,200 for the 1999-2000 academic year.

Crowded seminars raise concern

BY MAGGIE BUHACZYK

Department members say a lack of resources is responsible for overcrowded upper-year English and history seminar classes at Queen's this year.

While these departments traditionally have a cap on the number of students in their third and fourth year seminars, in many cases, classes are exceeding the maximum limit.

"It is a serious problem but we don't have any extra resources," said Paul Christianson, chair of the history department.

According to John Pierce, undergraduate chair of the English department, 300-level courses which were once limited to 25 students, are now expanding to 30. The history and sociology departments also have moved to larger classrooms.

Kathryn Peddle, Arts '00, said third-year history courses are especially overcrowded. "HIST 470 is great because there are only 10 people in the class but HIST 343 is a bit too big. It's a seminar but we don't get to participate that much," she said.

Lisa Barnett, Arts '99, a student enrolled in HIST 350 agreed. "If you want to be heard you will, but if you're quiet, then it's a big enough number to let you hide in the background," she said.

Carl Keane, head of the sociology department attributed overcrowded seminars in his department to an unexpected growth in undergraduate student interest. "Usually, from year to year, there are no problems in enrolment, but this year we have found a significant increase in the first through fourth-year courses," he said. "Students might be recognizing that the analytical skills picked up in our methods courses are skills which can be applied elsewhere," he added.

Keane has asked the undergraduate students committee to examine the overcrowding in upper-year sociology seminars. "We're all trying to figure out why we've seen an increase," he said. The sociology department has added an additional two half courses at the 400-level and has expanded second and third-year classes. While the fourth-year courses are presently at their maximum, Keane says that they do not exceed the 25 student cap.

His funeral was held yesterday at 2 p.m. at Beth Israel Synagogue, with his interment following at the Beth Israel Cemetery.

Fon rings true

Queen's film wins Ontario festival

BY FIONA STEVENSON

Three Queen's students picked up a first-place prize for best experimental film in the TVOntario Film Festival on October 15 at an award ceremony in Toronto.

Fourth-year film student Angela Pilas, Mark Magee, Arts '98, and Matt Poirier Arts '98 produced the film last year for FILM 350, the department's advanced production course.

"We're thrilled, needless to say," said Blaine Allan, head of the film department. "We're very happy when a film from this department wins an award at Telefest."

The six-minute film, entitled Fon, is "an experimental film based on the telephone," explained Pilas. "There are four characters... and one operator who links different conversations together to make one big musical interlude."

"We knew we wanted to make a visual piece," Pilas said. "If you look at student films in general, they are all very heavily narrative-based," Pilas said.

The film stars past and present Queen's students Andy Lehrer, Serge Mister, and Brian Lewis, Daniel Mackey, Professor Tim Fort, and former AMS President Maynard Plant as the operator.

"I think it's impressive both as an imaginative work and as a stylistic achievement," said Allan.

Deregulation 'unfair'

Upper-year students, who are protected by a grandfather clause, pay $5,516 in tuition fees this year. Returning students' tuition fees for 1999-2000 is still undetermined.

The increases are a result of the provincial government's decision last spring to deregulate tuition for law and medicine programs in Ontario. Deregulation allows individual universities to charge as much as they want for these two programs.

"A lot of students are really concerned about the tuition increases and how they will cope with them," said Winston Tsui, Meds '00.

Bogstad expressed concern that "although first year students are paying $6,748 this year, OSAP has put a cap of $4,500 on the amount that students can claim."

According to Dean of Health Sciences Barry Smith, the tuition increases are bringing the cost of a medical degree to an "appropriate level" in light of medical students' "future earning potential."

Enrolment in Queen's medicine increased this year, Smith added, reflecting the "strong market of people wanting a medical degree."

Smith said the increases are beneficial because they will "allow medical students more input into the product that they are consuming."

There is "a high level of financial assistance available," Smith said, although he added that this year's figures are not yet available. In addition, the school will be "monitoring any adverse effects" of the increases, Smith said.

Meds '02 President Matthew Bronwich said, "Although the increases are drastic, the most devastating part about the issue is the fact that government loans aren't keeping pace." As a result, "medical students increasingly have to turn to bank loans to finance their educations," he added.

The problem with the banks is that "you have to pay interest right away and the banks have little flexibility in negotiating their lines of credit, as is possible with Canada student loans," Bronwich explained.

"In professional schools where tuition is rapidly increasing, there is a dire need for a review of payment and loan systems," Bronwich said.

"[It's] unfair that medical school tuition be deregulated," said Sandra McGill, Meds '99. "The majority of students are carrying debts from an undergraduate and/or Masters Degree."

McGill said the increases are "discouraging a lot of good people from getting to medical school," while failing to account for the fact that "[medical students] will also have to incur costs when they are residents... a $5,000 charge per year of their residency."

Who's Where hits campus on schedule

BY RENÉE HUANG

The 1998-99 Who's Where staff and student directory, a publication which has been plagued by late release dates in previous years, has arrived on campus right on schedule.

Mike Beltzner, co-editor of Who's Where/What's Next publications said the publication release is on target with the window of time the editors had estimated, between October 14 - 28. "We ran into a couple of problems," said Beltzner. "We're a little later than we hoped."

"Without trying to assess any type of blame," Beltzner said, there were a few minor delays, including an extension of the amount of time students had to opt-in. As a result, the editors did not receive data from the Registrar's office until mid-September.

WW/WN Co-Editor Jason Teske's recent firing did not contribute to the publication's lateness. "Jason was, interestingly enough, fired four days after [the directory was] sent off," Beltzner said. "The book would have been a lot later had Jason been fired earlier."

The Who's Where editors normally try to release their publication by late October, although the latest release date in recent history was two years ago, well after the end of fall term classes on December 12.

Through an opt-in function on the QCARD system, this year's Who's Where obtained the listing consent of almost 15,000 students. This is a sizeable increase from last year's publication, which allowed students to opt-out of the directory through the QCARD system. Beltzner speculated that the 1997-98 version of the Who's Where had approximately 10,000 students listed.

He indicated that the increase in student listings may have been due to an awareness campaign in September that attempted to raise the profile of the Who's Where. Called "Get Listed!," students were told about the value of having their phone number, home and school addresses and e-mail available in the publication, Beltzner said.

In addition to local business discount coupons, a map of Kingston, transit routes, and information about Queen's clubs, faculty and organizations, this year's Who's Where will include a host of new features. Among highlights is a page that explains how to convert internal Queen's phone numbers when Information Technology Services installs a new 533 exchange and five-digit internal dialing system in December.

Also unique to the 1998-99 Who's Where, the directory includes addresses and phone numbers of students taking a year off school to work on "The Experience Option." The space reserved for a student's Kingston address instead lists the student's work address.

Copies of the 30th edition of the Who's Where are available for pick up from the AMS Infobank in the JDUC lower ceiling to full-time undergraduate students with valid student cards. Faculty members may order copies of the publication through Queen's stationary stores.

Legendary game praised

BY CRYSTAL BONA

The cover of Burke and Calvert's Legend of the Grease Pole CD Rom game, now available on campus.

The secretive bonding experience of the greasepole, an annual frosh week event for engineering students, is not so mysterious now. Through the ingenious creativity and initiative of Queen's students Robert Burke, Sci '99 and Craig Calvert, a first-year Vancouver Film School student, anyone can experience the tradition by playing the CD ROM game the duo designed.

Burke came up with the idea for the game, entitled The Legend of the Greasepole, more than two years ago. "The greasepole seemed like such an awesome subject for a game," he said.

The player of the game acts as a FREC and attempts to stall 95 first-year students for as long as possible in their collective attempt to reach the top of the pole. Stalling tactics include throwing pizza, apples, beer and ArtSci students into the pit in order to distract the frosh.

Burke claimed the creation of the game was a non-profit initiative. "It was certainly never for money... I just love it," said Burke, who designed another computer game in high school.

More than 50 Queen's students make up The Legend of the Greasepole Team, the group responsible for bringing the game to life.

Until last month, the project was entirely student-funded. Now, the game is being partially sponsored by the Alma Mater Society's Special Projects Fund, which is designed to assist new initiatives at Queen's that require financial backing. Burke said he is "extremely grateful for the support that Greasepole has received from the AMS."

The funding will help cover the cost of making the CDs. About $8,000 has been spent so far on software and rentals of digital recording equipment for the game.

An important feature of the game is its artificial intelligence. "AI is a way of writing your program so that the characters have the ability to think and to respond to what's going on around them," Burke explained.

Each of the 95 frosh think 24 times a second and base their actions on their own interests and drives, he added.

"Just like at the real pole, the frosh in the game start out enthusiastic, but lame. Eventually they learn to work as a team and teach each other tricks to get to the top," Burke explained.

This new technique for teamwork among animated characters, dubbed 'IntelliFrosh,' has impressed Bruce Blumberg, a professor at Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Blumberg, who received a copy of the game from some of his graduate students, sent Burke an e-mail praising his work with the game and inquiring about how the frosh interact with one another. In the e-mail, Blumberg said he was "very impressed... [Greasepole was] very clever."

"It was a real honour," said Burke. "Professor Blumberg is one of the leaders in the artificial intelligence field."

Although the object of the game is to stall the frosh, its overall goal is to promote a sense of teamwork, Burke said. The game always ends with the frosh victorious, and the FRECs happy for them.

The game has been enthusiastically received. "The alumni loved it. An alumnus in New Zealand asked for a copy," said Burke. "We show it to high school students on tours and they love it as well. Over 500 copies have been sold," he added.

The game has also received positive response from the engineers themselves. "The amount of teamwork used to put the game together is a lot like the teamwork it takes to climb the pole. It's amazing that any student has had the capability and initiative to accomplish this," said Kirsten Sorensen, Sci '00.

The Legend of the Greasepole is available in Kingston at the Campus Bookstore, the College Merchant, Computer Depot and MicroAge. Although Burke and Calvert originally hoped to charge $20 for the game, the CDs are available to the Queen's community for between $12 and $18. About 200 copies of the game were also distributed by Information Technology Services to first-year engineering students who bought computers from ITS.

Law students see few changes under SGPS

BY LIANNE ELLIOT

This year marks the first that Queen's law students are represented by the Society of Graduate and Professional Students rather than the Alma Mater Society, and many law students said they do not notice a significant difference under the new government.

"I haven't really noticed a change... which I guess is a good thing," said Sonia Barrette, Law '00.

The decision to switch student governments was reached in a referendum held last March by the Law Students Society. Of the 55 per cent of law students who participated, two thirds voted in favour of a move to the SGPS.

LSS President Chris Ellis said he believes quality of representation was one of the major motivating factors behind the law students' decision to join the SGPS. "We felt that [the AMS] was not effectively representing us," Ellis said. Last year, as a part of the AMS, law students made up only four per cent of the 12,000 students represented by the society. Because of this low ratio, Ellis believes, "larger faculties' interests dominated the AMS."

By joining the SGPS, law students are no longer a minority, representing over 25 per cent of the 2,200 students accountable to the society.

Despite the large numbers of faculties such as Arts and Science, the AMS always attempts to "to listen to the smaller faculties," said Gord Moodie, AMS vice-president (operations). "It's disappointing when a group perceives that we are not serving them well," he added.

Another issue that may have influenced the LSS decision to switch governments was the predominant differences between law students and AMS students.

"Questions of affinity have always been a concern," SGPS president Chris Hales said. On average, law students are older than most undergraduates and are usually working towards their second degree. As a result, law students believe they "have more in common" with the graduate students of the SGPS than with the dominantly undergraduate AMS, Hales said.

Because of the move to the SGPS, certain benefits offered by the AMS will no longer be available to law students.

Since last March, a new AMS policy requires that all applicants to AMS jobs be AMS members, paying AMS student fees. These jobs include positions at the Publishing and Copy Centre, the Quiet Pub, Allie's Pub, the Used Book Store Exchange, AMS offices, Student Constables and Walkhome. This policy means that law students, now under the fourth-year demand. We don't want any students to suffer," said Keane.

Students in crowded seminars sit apart from discussion.

While the cause of the large seminars remains a mystery to the sociology department, Pierce and Christianson pointed to a lack of funding and resources as an explanation for the increases in their respective departments.

"The actual number of students in third and fourth year has been stable but the actual number of sections is declining," said Pierce.

In order to compensate for this decline, the English department has been forced to fit more students into the existing sections, he said. Pierce attributed the shift to a series of retirements and leaves which, without replacement, have resulted in a shortage of instructors to spread across the curriculum. "We are, just now, hiring an instructor to replace two people who have left two or three years ago," he said.

"In times of financial difficulty it is difficult to expand."

— Paul Christianson, chair of history department

"The [history] department underwent contraction in 1995-96 and has remained the same size since," said Christianson. "In times of financial difficulty it is difficult to expand," he added.

A growth in the number of students requesting 100 and 200-level history courses is also becoming a concern. "We've had to move a professor from a 300 to 200-level course because 200 enrollment was higher than expected," said Christianson.

The English department is looking into shifting some of its resources to the upper-year sections. "We might have to hire more part-time instructors to teach the one and two hundred level courses and move the full-time faculty to the 200 sections," said Pierce. "We have a limited number of instructors to work with," he added.

Despite these difficulties, Christianson said the history department remains determined to maintain its seminar courses. "Students feel very strongly that we should continue our seminar system and the department has a strong commitment to do that," he said.

Peddle agreed: "I think that smaller seminars are more useful for the students because there is more opportunity to participate."

approximately $3,000 in production costs. The students received a $500 bursary from the Davies Foundation, which they used to enter 12 film festivals in Canada, Europe and the United States.

Three finalists in each category went to the Toronto ceremony. Pilas' group was in competition with Ryerson Polytechnic and York Universities, which typically dominate the TVOntario festival, Pilas said.

"For us to actually go in there and win against schools like Ryerson and York is a big deal. We didn't think we stood a chance," she added.

While the film schools at Ryerson and York are production schools, Queen's specializes in film theory and has only one camera and one editing suite for five FILM 350 groups, Pilas explained.

However, Pilas said Queen's film students do considerably well given their limited resources.

"There's definitely talent," she said. "We just don't have the equipment where people can spend a lot of time."

The film's success goes beyond the TVOntario festival. FON is currently being played in Rhode Island and Europe and is enjoying a two-week run at a Florida festival. The film also won honourable mention at a recent Canadian film festival.

"Just the amount of attention we've gotten from this film is incredible," said Pilas.

All three students are interested in pursuing careers in the film industry. Portier is currently working as a production assistant in Montreal, Magee is working at Shift magazine in

AMS employees checked

By FIONA STEVENSON

More than 300 salaried employees of the Alma Mater Society will be visiting AMS Information Officer Greg McKellar during the next two weeks to show him their validated student cards.

"Everyone's subject to review," said McKellar. "We're going to follow through on this."

According to the AMS Hiring and Appointment Policy and Procedures Manual, drafted last February, for a student to be eligible for employment in an AMS salaried position, they must be enrolled in at least two Arts and Science equivalent credits and have paid the full slate of mandatory student activity fees.

"The AMS only had an official employment manual in 1994, but that was just kind of a first start," explained McKellar. The manual was completely revamped last year. "It was just overdue. We knew there were a lot of problems," McKellar said.

"The new manual is certainly far and away the best and most effective manual we've had," said McKellar. "Now we really for the first time have a good clear set of rules."

McKellar said in the past "we relied on good faith" and, as a result, "it may have been that there was the odd person who has slipped through."

Although the policy will be strictly enforced this year, McKellar emphasized, "We're going to try to afford everyone an opportunity. No one's looking to hurt anybody." Salaried employees who do not meet the criteria outlined in the employment manual will be able to pay their student fees and pick up extra courses next term.

McKellar said the AMS is looking into a more efficient method of verifying this information in the future. "This is a time-consuming process," he said.

Fees lower

SGPS, are no longer eligible for these positions unless they decide to pay AMS student fees as well.

According to Joe Lin, Law '99, "AMS Jobs were unavailable to law students to begin with... I only knew around two [law students] with [AMS] jobs last year."

The same problem has arisen with the AMS Judicial Committee. Committee positions formally guaranteed to law students, including chair, deputy chair and chief prosecutor, have recently been opened to all students. As of yet, like with other AMS jobs, law students will have to pay AMS fees to be eligible to apply for them.

Law students are also required to pay $180.71 for health plans under the SGPS as opposed to $87.50 for the health plan offered by the AMS. However, mandatory student fees with the SGPS are $180.27 instead of $262.34 under the AMS.

Despite joining the SGPS, the LSS still hopes to be able to work with the AMS on issues concerning all students. "We are not anti-AMS," Ellis said. "We want to put the division behind us and work with the AMS on tuition and social issues."

Living in fear

WHEN A 21-YEAR OLD GAY student is found brutally murdered in Wyoming, we are tempted to point to the extreme fringes of society to explain how such an act of hatred is possible in our 'tolerant' society. Or perhaps we rationalize this violent hate crime as the product of an intolerant culture in the Southern United States.

Ottawa indicate that a substantial percentage of all hate crimes are committed against gays and lesbians.

While we may have made significant advances in increasing awareness, and in legislating protection of queer-rights, it would be a mistake to think that the murder of Matthew Shepard does not belie a similar undercurrent of hatred in Canadian society.

It would be a mistake to think that the murder of Matthew Shepard does not belie a similar undercurrent of hatred in Canadian society.

Either way, we avoid confronting how pervasive the hatred of gays and lesbians remains. Rather than blame the rising tide of gay-bashing in Canada on disparate elements of society, we should recognize that there still remains a latent hatred of homosexuality in some sectors of mainstream society. Reports of gay-bashing in cities such as Toronto, Vancouver and

Native justice

IT IS POSSIBLE THAT CONNIE Jacobs, and her nine year old son, were the victims of race discrimination when they were shot and killed by an RCMP officer on the Tsuu T'ina reserve south of Calgary last March. Despite the finding by the B.C. Attorney-General's office and an external review that concluded that the shooting was not racially motivated, it is undeniable that many native people feel this incident speaks "of a deadly form of systematic race discrimination." It's not difficult to sympathize with this concern in light of the history of allegations of racial discrimination of natives by the RCMP. The ambiguity surrounding the facts of the case, however, make it difficult for an outsider to judge what motivated Constable Dave Voller to return fire and kill Jacobs and her son.

According to Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations Phil Fontaine, the conclusion that Constable Voller should not face charges was influenced by what he considers a "biased legal examination done in B.C. Additionally, many members of the Tsuu T'ina feel victimized by the shooting and question whether they are really receiving justice.

The upcoming fatality inquiry by Judge Thomas Goodson should make every effort to take these concerns into account.

Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere.

Off of the leash

LAST NIGHT I WALKED ALONE through the streets of Kingston. That should be a simple and fairly innocuous statement, but when I speak it to friends and family I am met with consternation, and even anger. Why should such a simple fact become the cause of friction between myself and those I love?

Perhaps the problem is that "I" am a woman. Women, I have always been told, are not supposed to walk alone anywhere at night. It is dangerous. There are evil people out there. Statistically, most of those evil people are men, and they will do terrible things to women who are vulnerable.

It actually hurts my friends and family to hear that I walked alone anywhere, that I knowingly jeopardized my safety. More disconcerting to them is the fact that I walked alone with the clear knowledge that there have been multiple assaults in the Kingston area in recent weeks. I walked alone knowing that the local police have issued a warning that they strongly suspect there are people in this "safe" university town who are using drugs to knock women out and assault them.

Last night, I decided that I had had enough.

Still, I walked alone, a ghost on the streets. No one I passed would meet my eyes, no group parted to let me pass, no one smiled at me or acknowledged me.

Women should not be walking alone, said their body language. Women need to be frightened, need to walk in groups, need to be safe, safe, safe. You are not safe when you are alone, they said with the slouch of a shoulder, with a furtive backward glance.

What prompted me to so recklessly take my life into my hands? To be honest, I did it because I had to. I did it because I live every day of my life on a leash. During the day I am tied tightly to the knowledge that I am more likely to be assaulted by someone I know than someone I don't. I am tied to the violence felt not only by the women in our society, but by everyone who is perceived as vulnerable, different or not of the norm. At night I am tied to the reality that I cannot go anywhere without someone else beside me. I am tied to the idea of waiting for Walkhome or for a friend to walk with me so I can be safe.

Last night I decided that I had enough. I walked, alone and ostracized, in an effort to say that I will not take this any more. Although I was intelligent enough to be afraid, I swallowed my fear and told myself and my society: I refuse to let you circumscribe my life. You may beat me, hurt me, rape me and my sisters and brothers who have fought for so long against your violence and ignorance. You may do these awful things to me, but you can no longer make me tremble at the thought of walking free into the dark and the wind. I will not let you.

Last night I walked alone through the streets of Kingston, and I will do it again.

OPINIONS

Where's the integrity? It's time for Liberals to get back to basics

INTEGRITY: Being able to stick by one's opinions and actions in the face of adversity. More so, being able to stick to your own personal values that make you strong and forward-looking.

I am writing this article to protest the actions of the federal government because I feel I am compelled to do so. This Liberal government, a party closely associated over the years with individual rights and freedoms, has, in my opinion, managed to violate the very foundations the party was built upon.

I am a member of the Liberal Party of Canada. I am also a member of the Queen's Liberal Association, although this article does not necessarily reflect our university wing's attitudes or beliefs towards the Liberal Party. This is of my own doing and my own personal beliefs.

I have, over the past several years, been witness to many good things done by my political party. The deficit is gone, the economy has improved, and times in Canada are quite good. But the past several months I have tried to swallow decisions I just cannot agree with in any way, shape or form.

Some of my frustration with our federal government stems from me being what one would consider "leftist" in the Liberal Party. My party is now, undeniably, economically conservative. It was a bitter pill to swallow in cutting the federal deficit, but I accepted it in the hopes that something good would come out of it. Economically, it proved to be a good move. But my party's rightward shift in the political spectrum has caused me to bear witness to an ominous fact: my party, at least the section that holds the most power and influence, is now also socially conservative. This bothers me immensely.

Recent developments on the federal scene embody some of my frustrations with the Liberal party's new path.

The Hepatitis C scandal: I am in favour of giving money to victims who have received such viruses due to the fact the test, while not available in Canada until 1983, was easily available in the U.S. for several years before. One can't be easily affordable in terms of human lives if a matter of years and the availability of tests are in doubt.

The pay equity ruling: The cost of giving out such payments to those civil servants denied equal treatment should not be questioned. Human beings are human beings, and while I might be a bleeding heart, I'll be damned if men and women, majority and minority, are not given equal treatment — especially in a society as diverse as our own.

The APEC scandal: Pierre Trudeau once said that law and order is an important aspect of Canadian society and that government should attempt to uphold these values. But at the expense of civil liberties? I don't know everything involved in APEC, but I'm pretty certain about one thing: individuals who protest peacefully have the right to do so.

Even though the government has set up a commission to hear about the student's concerns, it has done many things that cause me to question the process of such a hearing. By refusing to pay the legal fees of the students, the government has sabotaged the effectiveness of the hearings. What am I to believe? Am I to sit back and accept this and violate my own personal conscience?

I suppose I am taking the road that several backbench Liberal MPs have gone down already by speaking out against their own party. At times, party politics tends to snifle debate; however, politics should be about the freedom to discuss and debate. Individuals who join a political party should not feel limited in critically examining their own party. It is only through a critical examination of the processes and policies of one's political affiliation that real progress can be made in our liberal democracy.

I make no apologies for my remarks, nor do I feel regret in doing so. Make no mistake, I remain a member of the Liberal party and will continue to support all efforts in the pursuit of liberalism. But I must speak out in support of what I believe is right. And I hope for my sake, the party's sake, and the country's sake that I'm not the only one.

Letters to the Editors

Interpretation of racism issues important

Dear Editors,

At the risk of being singled out and labeled blatantly racist or at the very least seriously ignorant, I would like to respond to the letter published in last Friday's Journal, entitled "Responses show lack of awareness" by IDIS 302 T.A. Nalini G. Naidoo.

The first thing that strikes me is the intellectually condescending and self-aggrandizing tone of the letter. To suggest that IDIS 302 students are somehow empowered with multicultural clairvoyance surpassing that of the ignorant Queen's community is almost as comical as it is insulting. This self-declared monopoly of the moral high-ground reeks more of televised evangelical propaganda than of pure education.

Naidoo's interpretation of Ian Collins' account that "a significant percentage of the Queen's population did not find the poster offensive," as an indicator of a lack of education and awareness on campus, is presumptuous to say the least. It suggests that because there wasn't more outspoken support for this witch-hunt that there must be a lack of suitable issue-related understanding.

Speaking as part of this said significant percentage, I am a student of the teachings of anti-racism and contemporary anthropological ideology. However, I have formed my own opinion on the matter and have judged accordingly. I sincerely hope that the formation of differing opinions is encouraged and respected in all facets of education,

On a more personal note, I have to confess that I particularly resent the fact that, as advocates and "champions" of such a sensitive cause, there is a certain correlating near-McCarthyist immunity to criticism or challenge. What does this tell us? Are we really afraid of the subject, or are we afraid of the potential for persecution at the hands of militant advocates of hypersensitivity should our views happen to be mildly incongruent?

I feel it is important for me to reiterate that I do support the promotion of sensitivity and awareness, but also that people have the right to interpret information. And I would ask that a modicum of sensitivity be reserved for those of us who have decided for ourselves. I long for the day that a mildly risqué caricature can be taken in stride. The struggle continues...

AMS Assembly

Why I voted 'No'

Dear Editors,

I find it interesting that your editorial opinion with respect to alignment can dramatically shift within two weeks. On October 6, you wrote that "before any decision to apply for membership can be made, the student body must have an opportunity to weigh the advantages and disadvantages of both" potential lobbying organizations, that is, OUSA and CFS-O. However, on October 20, you criticized AMS Assembly members for failing to ratify a referendum question that demanded students to consider only one of those organizations.

I sit on AMS Assembly as an ASU

Representative. I will now "stand up and be counted," as AMS Academic Affairs Commissioner Milan Konopek urged. I voted against the referendum question being placed on the ballot, not because I love the feeling of power (which I don't have), but because the question being asked of Queen's students was not clear.

The original question proposed by AMS President Tom Stanley was vague and left open the possibility that the AMS was already a member of OUSA, which we obviously are not. The subsequent question, upon which Assembly members voted, did not make clear to students that there is another provincial alternative to OUSA, let alone two national lobbying organizations.

Although I commend the Stanley-Moodie-Loat executive team on their diligence in fulfilling election promises, I felt, as did The Journal on October 6, that students deserve a chance to choose between two organizations.

Unlike The Journal, I have no intention of flip-flopping in the next two weeks.

PS. For the record I was, and remain, in favour of the motion for a secret ballot. If The Journal doesn't like the use of secret ballot, perhaps they would like to introduce an amendment to the AMS Constitution, which allows secret ballot votes.

Why I voted 'No' II

Dear Editors,

This letter is in response to Ms. Sun's letter entitled "Students deserve choice" which appeared in the October 23 issue of The Journal, as I am one of those 18 Assembly members who voted against sending the question regarding the AMS's proposed membership in the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance to referendum.

I would like to begin by saying that I fully stand behind my decision to vote 'no.' My reasoning was simple: the question which was to be put forth by the AMS was misleading. The question read as follows: "Do you agree with the establishment of a $1.95 fee (mandatory) to support Queen's Alma Mater Society's membership in the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance?"

In my opinion, this question reads as though the AMS is already a member of OUSA and the students of Queen's are being asked to simply approve an increase in fees. By the end of the debate on this motion I had been completely convinced that this topic needed to be on the referendum but, in my mind's eye, I could not, in good conscience, approve such a question to go forth.

My desire to have this topic on the referendum, however, is not to say that I don't agree with the arguments which were made against putting any question forth. This is not to say that Queen's students are incapable of making an informed decision, but the person leading the topic of alignment is Mr. Tom Stanley, who happens to have spent 18 months dealing with this issue. Over the past few months, he has tried with great passion to convince approximately 40 Assembly members that alignment with OUSA is in the best interests of Queen's students. Yet many Assembly members, including myself, are still undecided. How then is Mr. Stanley supposed to educate 11,000 students on the merits of OUSA in a two week period and expect a well thought-out decision on referendum day?

As for the topic of the secret ballot, these occur frequently in Assemblies. They are not meant to hide opinions from the record, but rather to provide a clear picture of what the situation is. Secret ballots are used to allow a vote which is completely free of pressure. As for why I agreed to a secret ballot, it's simple. I didn't. That is, I didn't have to. As long as one member of Assembly requests a question to go forth.

A national priority Professional sport deserves the millions

ial "The Cost of Holding On."

I believe, however, that he is omitting several key factors. First, how big is the price tag on the pride of a country? Hockey is Canada's game; something that we can unite in, enjoy and take a healthy sense of identity from. Where were you when Paul Henderson scored the Summit Series goal in '72? Probably not alive yet, but I bet your father can tell you where he was. Do you still curse Brett Hull for his '96 defection? Do you still wonder why Ray Bourque was the fifth shooter in Nagano? If you do, you're among several million other Canadians who share the same feelings.

Hockey is one of the few unsullied unifiers Canada has... even the English and French agree on it! It's Don Cherry unity, but it's a powerful, powerful thing. Hell, I'm a Leafs' fan, and even I manage to take pride from the game. Isn't that worth $5 million to you?

Second is the economics of sport. Governments don't support anything unless it's worth their while, and sport returns healthy dividends to the home city, province and country. Twenty thousand fans pay for seats, eat dinner, guzzle beer, purchase Sundin jerseys, buy programs and join the millions that give the CBC the viewer turnout that keeps it alive. Five million spent wisely on sport is returned many times over in tax revenue and other kickbacks, and it profits the cities to have the team in the area. Who would you watch in Toronto without the Leafs? The Argonauts? They'd like that, I guess.

Last is the player-as-a-role-model theory. I support government funding of pro-sport for the same reason I (wincingly) support multi-million dollar salaries: if the $3M-a-year hockey player on TV who tells the country not to do drugs saves even one curious pre-teen's life, isn't it worth it? How many kids work their butts off to be the next Wayne Gretzky, and in doing so learn self-discipline, teamwork, and have fun along the way? What's that worth? How many people are so inspired by Cal Ripken's steel that they stick it out, and finish something they may have quit otherwise? What's that worth?

Even though some athletes have created negative press and abused their power with drugs, criminal behaviour, or embarrassment, they are still outweighed by the positive role models that the millions we spend on their salaries through ticket sales, merchandise, and government subsidy are a measly, fractional pittance, and one of the best investments we have, all things considered.

And while several scandals have showed that the political hierarchy of professional sport is no innocent either, these controversies have given us valuable opportunities for public reflection on important matters like racism, sexism, white-collar crime, and sexual abuse in all sporting institutions.

So, I agree that $5 million would probably benefit a family more than a franchise. But to screw the other 10 million-odd families out of something as deeply Canadian to many as the social programs and the cold winters, I say no deal.

Golden Words

Case and point?

I'm glad to see that LSS President Chris Ellis is gratified by my recent letter to The Journal, though I don't think it proves, as Ellis seems to believe, that it reinforces his point that GW does not understand its responsibility to the Queen's community. I say this for the following reason: I am no longer a representative of Golden Words, nor do I presume to speak for that publication. I speak only for myself, and this is why I have chosen this forum.

Moreover, I do not recall launching a "personal attack" on Ellis in my letter. Rather, I merely denied certain ludicrous "quotes" that he attributed to me—apparently secure in his mistaken belief that I, a recent graduate, would not ever see his letter and learn of his deception. Also, I pointed out a fatal flaw in his poorly-thought-out criticism of EngSoc President Keith Stewart.

Let's set the record straight: Ellis attempted to use my name to support his argument. In return, I simply exposed his argument as a deeply flawed one, and rendered his case impotent. Ellis chooses to regard this as a personal attack. Let us hope that our legal-minded chum learns to put together a coherent argument instead of simply playing the poor loser when he finally enters a courtroom, lest he continue to be so often held in contempt.

Student Housing

A trashy solution

Dear Editors,

Has anyone else noticed that most of the "student village" and surrounding areas are a disgusting mess? Renaming this area isn't going to change the fact that it is a "ghetto" in every sense (complete with squeegee kids.) In fact in my travels to nine provinces, 20 states and to Costa Rica I have never seen a dirtier area in my life. It is no wonder we have skunk and squirrel problems (which seem to have multiplied in the two years I have been away from Queen's.)

Are we going to wait until there is an outbreak of disease before someone takes responsibility for this problem? The university doesn't care because they don't own the property. Most (not all) landlords don't give a shit as the rent checks keep coming in and higher property taxes or spending time maintaining their properties to minimum standards might cut into their profits. The city doesn't give a fuck about anything but their "waterfront for tourists." I lived on Aberdeen Street and we often waited four or five days for our street to be plowed after major snowstorms. A petiodic street sweeping would be a good start.

OPIRG seems prepared to whine about third world problems they can't solve, and embarrass our school by threatening to back out of loans they agreed to pay back to the banks instead of addressing an issue right in their back (and front) yards. The city's budget is consumed by the high welfare roles (another group who make this mess.) I'm not really for Welfare but perhaps this welfare recipients should spend a few hours a month cleaning up our streets to earn their free ride.

Arsci '00

Just because we are only here for a few years doesn't mean we don't have to take responsibility for our neighborhood.

I propose two simple ideas to help solve this problem. First, students: we are not animals, so stop throwing garbage on the ground and spend the next 15 minutes to clean up your yards. Second, OPIRG and the university government need to promote the idea of using garbage cans with lids to students instead of garbage bags as our furry friends can easily tear into bags for a free meal, spreading garbage on the streets which the city is unwilling or unable to clean up. This idea can be spread through advertising and perhaps some kind of university subsidy on garbage cans so students or landlords can cheaply and easily obtain them.

Everyone, let's take some pride in our community. Just because we are only here for a few years doesn't mean we don't have to take responsibility; if we don't, nobody else will.

Cola Deals

Cola argument fizzes

Dear Editors,

In the October 20 issue of The Journal one of your contributors, Michael Johnson, looks at the potential consequences of Queen's signing a deal with a distributor of Coca-Cola that would grant it exclusive rights on campus. He asks "Having this money for student programs and scholarships or bursaries would be wonderful, but at what cost?" After mentioning many of the ill-effects associated with consuming high quantities of sugar and caffeine rich drinks Michael ends the article by likening white sugar to heroin and, one can only assume, assigning these potential "costs" to the group within Queen's responsible for the proposal.

While his line of thought does not contain any factual inaccuracies it follows a somewhat illogical path. If Queen's grant exclusive rights to any soft drinks distributor this, in itself, will not increase the amount of soft drinks consumed by Queen's students. Its interesting that the author omits any description of plans to increase advertising on campus (even if he did the argument would not be entirely persuasive).

All that the proposals would succeed in doing would be to grant a drinks manufacturer a monopoly within Queen's University that would result in their drinks being consumed in replacement of drinks currently consumed of other manufacturers. Basic economic theory and common sense imply that the consumption of soft drinks per se would remain the same.

Ignorant, emotive journalism like this is not only bad quality, it is detrimental to your newspaper and, more importantly, the Queen's community as a whole. Instead of being so quick to criticize your contributors should aim to be honest and impartial.

doctor who practices Orthomolecular Medicine, Dr. Abram Hoffer, who instructed them to get off sugar completely, and to read the book Sugar Blues. I have seen the dramatic improvements first hand, and finally they have been able to start cutting back on their medication. I decided to read the book myself, and it has made a huge difference in my life as well.

The softer side of Brock

Dear Editors,

Recently there have been a number of vicious and misleading letters in The Journal attacking my integrity and beliefs. I feel that in order to defend my honour against these slanderous lies and allegations, I need to explain my background to those who seem to enjoy distorting the truth for their own malicious gain.

Every summer since I was 16 I have had a job. I am sure the vast majority of Queen's students can probably say the same. I know the value of work and realize it is something that should be expected of everyone in society. Two years ago I struggled for over eight months to start my own business, which I eventually managed to get on its feet. I created my own computer camp for young children at a school in Toronto. The camp has operated for two years now and has expanded to a number of other areas. I provided a well-paying job not only for myself but for other staff members as well.

No, I'm not some spoiled rich brat who lets Daddy write all the cheques. I worked damn hard to make this dream of mine a reality and I am quite proud to say as a result I provided employment for some fellow students in the process. I didn't bitch about how unfair the world was or how hard it is to find a good job — I created my own job. The system does work if you are intelligent and willing to work for your goals.

Cynthia Dixon wrote that I had no right to discuss the hardship of student debt because I would never have to face it. I make no apologies for my background, and I admit I am very fortunate to have the wealth that I do.

However, I have not let it spoil me, and nor have I let it blind me to the realities of life. One of my housemates comes from an extremely destitute and poor village in rural Ontario. I have seen firsthand the extreme levels of both ends of the economic spectrum. He has shown me the number of welfare cases and drug-addicts that litter his community. I have seen the broken lives and crushed dreams of those forced to live off the "government cheese."

Believe it or not Ms. Dixon, I don't sit around each week in my mansion, sipping Dom Perignon and discussing how the millionaires club should operate next week. I have not led the sheltered existence many of you seem to believe I have. What I want is to find the best ways to help people, such as my housemate, escape that poverty while at the same time realizing it can't simply be given to them for free.

Even worse, Matt Inwood's letter was preposterously misleading. He claims my "tyrannical" rants have no place here, anymore than they did at UCC. He is the type of student who seems content to mindlessly follow mob mentality and popular opinion like a good little sheep. This is what bothers me about Queen's — no one dares speak out against what is perceived as the "popular" sentiment. We truly are a school of mostly "kiss asses" who dare not go against the mainstream. I try to get people to think about why they believe what they do, while challenging the accepted modes of thinking in an attempt to foster some debate on the subjects. So sorry Matt if you're not up to the challenge.

Forgive me if I try to have a little fun in my letters or articles in the process. I don't claim to be a true "man of the people" but I'm not as bad as you may suspect. I've tried to not let my privileged life spoil me.

What I want is an honest discussion of the issues at Queen's. Sometimes, I've noticed, you need to "stir the pot" in order to make that happen.

Still friends?

Dear Editors,

I would like to respond to Matthew Inwood's misinterpretation of a statement in my previous letter. The phrase "... the rest of us are here ..." was supposed to have been "... a lot of us here ..." The wrong version was submitted, and I admit that it did alter the context of what I was trying to say.

Also, when I wrote "[Brock Jones] and all [his] UCC friends..." what I actually meant was "[Brock Jones] and all [his] (literal) UCC friends" to whom he had referred in a previous letter. I certainly did not mean the statement to be generalized to all Upper Canada College graduates. I apologize to Mr. Inwood for any distress I caused him in assuming that Mr. Jones actually did have some friends.

The Media

Bias is everywhere

Dear Editors,

I was surprised to read a criticism of The Toronto Star that I don't agree with, considering that paper's declining quality in recent years.

However, Eli Schuster's letter of October 20 puzzled me with its assertions that The Star is both a "mouthpiece for the Liberal Party" and an "attempt to bring socialism to the suburbs." Those of us concerned by the Liberal government's right-wing policies can only be bemused at that contradiction.

As for the suspension of Michael Taube's column, The Star indeed deserves criticism if it was for the reasons that Schuster outlines, although I suspect Taube's unreadability and dogmatism had more to do with it.

However, Schuster loses all credibility as a defender of diversity of opinion by saying "Conrad Black's... newspaper is starting to look better all the time." Conrad Black is notorious for suppressing any ideological disagreement in his papers, as the ousted Ottawa Citizen editors can attest to, and has publicly stated that he would fire any editor who supported a leftist government. For his new National Post, he has hired exclusively conservative editorial staff. Apparently Eli Schuster doesn't mind censorship as long as it's his views that are being enforced.

Campus Cuts

Thanks for the perspective

Dear Editors,

I sit here in marvel after reading Adam Kaminsky's article in the October 7 issue of The Journal entitled "Start Cutting Schools." It is a beautifully argued, well-written piece of work.

Obviously employable skills offer much more to society than the ability to use thought, language and communication in order to challenge the existing structures of power. Given that the world is in a state of economic growth, our elites must be doing the right thing. I mean, let's work hard now and once we're out of this minor recession we can once again use our right of free speech to involve ourselves politically. Because we don't need to think or exercise free speech as students, we only need universities to train the intellectual elite in highly specialized areas.

Adam makes me realize the usefulness of my undergraduate degrees in philosophy, commercial law and computer science. If New Zealand had only followed his guidelines then I (a second-rate high school grad) would have learned to program at one of the community colleges which he values so highly. I would then be working for a third-rate firm in New Zealand rather than about to finish my Masters Degree in Canada.

Isn't the entire purpose of universities to train the intellectual elite? Let's look at tenure — oh, that was developed to allow thought independent of political and religious interference, not to allow high specialization in an area almost irrelevant to society. And since money can buy private tutors aren't the economically elite the intellectually elite?

And free speech. If we are waiting for times to pick up before we use it, doesn't that mean that as long as times don't pick up we won't use it? So, as long as we have had elites we won't care? That's a mature argument. Economic growth? I doubt it. Recession? More like the undulating bottom of a depression.

For any complex system to grow it must be challenged. We don't want to live in a protective bubble; challenge is what makes us doubt, and doubt is what makes us human. Society is the same. We must challenge society if we want it to grow and be powerful. Two of the three major economic world powers had huge challenges in the past (Germany and Japan recovering from WWII.) Universities create an environment of intellectual and social diversity. It is in this type of environment that independent thoughts thrive, thoughts that challenge society. I abhor idealists.

Learn geography before downsizing

Dear Editors,

Of my graduating class of nearly two hundred, less than fifteen chose to attend post-secondary institutions outside of the city of Thunder Bay. Those who chose Lakehead did so not because they couldn't get accepted elsewhere or because they didn't want to go to a different university. Many preferred to stay at home because it was more affordable or because living at home was the only way they could attend a post-secondary education.

Adam Kaminsky, in his editorial piece (October 20) seems to have forgotten about accessibility. The "three universities in Northern Ontario" he's talking about are rather far from each other. Thunder Bay (Lakehead) is a 12-hour drive to Sudbury (Laurentian), 15 hours to North Bay (Nipissing). They're hardly across the street or the canal.

I'm glad to hear that he regards Lakehead's forestry and outdoor recreation programs highly, but I question his credentials in dismissing "the general arts programs at these three universities which, in [his] opinion, are not that good anyway."

Adam's solutions are too simplistic in these regards, amongst others in his editorial.

Health care still has a long way to go before women are receiving equal access, equal treatment and proper education

BY NAOMI BRUNEMEYER

OCTOBER IS BREAST CANCER AWARENESS Month, but this disease is only an element of a greater ailment, the problems in gender-based medicine.

Looking back to the beginning of the 20th century, we see a time when male obstetricians had secured a monopoly in the health care of women. By discrediting any lay competitors such as midwives, men had exclusive medical access and control over the organs of female reproduction.

A current glaring inequity within the health care profession is the consistent late diagnosis for many female health problems.

With the advent of the women's liberation movement, however, the health care profession began to radically shift in response to the growing concerns of women dissatisfied with a male-dominated health field. The health care profession became political.

The key issue in the women's health movement is equal access to health care, a goal that many believe has been already achieved since women are not being barred from the doctor's office or turned down at emergency rooms. Determining the level of access, however, is a much more complicated issue. Institutional barriers, the gap between the patient and practitioner's knowledge of medicine, and emotional factors behind health concerns are the principal issues concerning access to health care for women.

A current glaring inequity within the health care profession is the consistent late diagnosis of many health problems in women. Physicians have social expectations of women, which creates a stereotypical perception assuming that women are only vulnerable to particular ailments.

HIV IS OFTEN DIAGNOSED LATE in women for this very reason. It is a fact that women of university age are the fastest growing group to contract the virus. Health Canada reports that prior to 1993, the ratio of females to males reporting cases of HIV was 1 to 15. In 1995, it was 1 to 11, in 1996, 1 to 8, and in June of 1997, the ratio was 1 to 7. These statistics clearly show that women are contracting HIV. Furthermore, in more than 80 per cent of reported cases of Canadian women with HIV, the virus was contracted through heterosexual contact. Another fact: the transmission of HIV to heterosexual women is easier than the transmission of HIV to heterosexual males due to the nature of vaginal sexual intercourse. Yet, unless they are IV drug users, many women who are displaying symptoms of HIV will not be tested for the disease. This is all based on the ingrained belief that women are not at risk of contracting HIV.

As well, the symptoms of HIV in the early stages are vague and are often incorrectly attributed by physicians to various changes in a woman's cycle such as pre-menstrual syndrome and menopause. Other symptoms occur in different frequencies in men and women. Recurrent yeast infections, which serve as an early warning sign for HIV, are frequently not reported by women, or are simply dismissed by physicians. The later symptoms of HIV infection for women are associated with other sexually transmitted diseases, but this is not the case for the symptoms men experience, which could explain why many women delay seeking treatment since a lot of women may feel embarrassed seeking treatment for a sexually transmitted disease.

Early diagnosis of HIV infection allows women to prolong their lives by taking full advantage of HIV therapies and delaying the development of AIDS-related symptoms, not to mention that it gives women a better opportunity to make more informed decisions on reproductive choices.

Women, whose HIV infection is detected early and receive the appropriate treatment, live as long as their male counterparts. However, because women are less likely than men to receive an early diagnosis, periods of survival for women as compared to men have been shorter in several studies. Clearly, late detection limits a woman's chances for treatment and shortens their life.

ANOTHER PROBLEM IN THE HEALTH CARE SYSTEM is that drugs are often tested solely on male patients before their approval and then released on the market without studying the relative effects on women.

Every pregnant woman should have this brace.

An age-old ad from 1897 for the Natural Body Brace: the cure for "female weakness."

Prozac, for example, is used to treat unipolar depression and is the most frequently prescribed drug. Although women are two times more likely to be diagnosed with depression, Prozac was tested only on men before its release. And it was only discovered recently that the side effects of Prozac are more severe on women than men. Women, who make up the majority of cases of depression, are not getting equal treatment for this disease.

In addition, stress-related disorders, such as migraines, are not adequately treated in women by physicians. Stress has traditionally been associated with men in high-level positions; therefore, stress-related disorders are diagnosed more readily in men than women and treatment is better facilitated.

What a lot of people fail to understand is that the majority of unpaid work, such as childcare, housework, and caring for the elderly still falls to women, while a much greater percentage of women are in the workforce now. This dual role adds significant hours, and stress, to their work week. Although women are two to three times more likely to suffer from migraines, which can be a bi-product of stress, the stress in women's lives is often ignored from a medical perspective.

Although women are two times more likely to be diagnosed with depression, Prozac was tested only on men before its release.

ONE OF THE PRIMARY GOALS of the women's health movement is to transform the relationship between patients and practitioners. It is important to educate women on the risks specific to them and therefore better equip them to discuss their concerns with physicians. In addition, this would enable women to judge the quality of care they receive, assert their rights, act decisively and seek out alternatives as desired. This requires a certain amount of responsibility for women to become educated on issues that directly affect their health.

In a new book, The Harvard Guide to Women's Health, the difference between the questions that women do ask of their practitioners versus the questions that they should ask, is criticized. Karen Carlson, M.D. writes "...some health questions are not asked by enough women patients. Several of these questions relate to social issues that affect women's health. Women may be reluctant to raise them out of a sense of privacy, embarrassment, or even denial. Other questions about physical health just don't occur to many women. But the answers are critical to women's health and well being."

Breast self-examinations have evolved for women to monitor their own health concerns. In the 1940s, only 72 per cent of women diagnosed with breast cancer survived for five years or more. Today, the five-year survival rate has increased to 97 per cent, a direct result of the push for women to take control of their own health. Early diagnosis is the best defence in surviving breast cancer, which, if detected early, is not a medical emergency. It is a slow growing cancer allowing time for women to become educated in their options for treatment. Yet, one in every 28 women is still at risk of dying of breast cancer.

Women should also know how often they should be getting a Pap smear performed, and what risk factors are involved. They should also know how to best prepare for a Pap smear in order to get the most accurate results. Depending on a woman's risk factors for contracting cervical cancer, a Pap smear should be performed once a year after the age of 18.

Sexual activity increases your likelihood of having an abnormal test result, therefore women should begin having annual Pap smears earlier if they become sexually active before the age of 18. Sixty to 70 per cent of women at some point in their lives will have an abnormal test result. Further diagnostic testing must be performed to discern whether cancer cells are present in the cervix. A little less than half of abnormal test results indicate cervical cancer. Yet, more than 50 per cent of women aged 18 to 25 do not have an annual Pap test. If treated in its early stages, cervical cancer is an extremely curable form of cancer, with almost a 100 per cent survival rate.

Physical symptoms of cervical cancer do not manifest until the later stages of the disease where the survival rate drops to between 30 and 44 per cent of cases. Therefore, Pap smears are the first way to test for early signs of cervical cancer. When women are equipped with the knowledge of their specific health concerns, equal access to health care can be achieved.

Gender-specific health concerns of women are commonly related to reproduction and sexuality, and are therefore subject to psychosocial factors that male health concerns may not be. Why are women refusing to have annual Pap tests performed, delaying seeking medical treatment for STDs, and still dying of breast cancer? Even beyond a lack of the necessary knowledge is the psychological impact of women's health issues. Conducting a broad examination of diseases specific to women shows this relationship between women's health and sexuality and reproduction. Breast cancer is clearly related to a woman's reproductive ability and her sexuality. Cervical cancer risk increases with the amount of sexual activity a woman engages in. Therefore, these diseases invoke a lot of fear in women, fear to be judged, fear to not be able to have children, fear of losing their sexuality.

FOR WOMEN TO ACHIEVE EQUAL ACCESS to health care they must self-educate themselves on areas for which they are at risk. There also needs to be a commitment from the health care profession to start acknowledging the physiological and anatomical differences between men and women, without acknowledging the stereotypical behavioural differences. Until all participants open their eyes and work at this problem, progress will remain stagnant and women will continue to be plagued with a lack of medical attention.

RETURN TO GLORY?

Believe it or not, the Toronto Maple Leafs are the best team in the National Hockey League right now. The Leafs currently have a league-leading 5-1-1 record and a league best 26 goals. The story of the Leaf offence has been the number of multiple goal scorers the team possesses. Last season, it was Mats Sundin doing it all alone, but this year Sergei Berezin leads the team with five goals. Moreover, the goal-tending situation, while awkward, has seen both Felix Potvin and Curtis Joseph excelling. With new coach Pat Quinn at the helm, things are as exciting for hockey fans in hogtown as they were when another Pat (Burns) ran the show.

OFF SEASON BEGINS

On Monday, the New York Mets signed catcher Mike Piazza to the richest contract in baseball history. Piazza, who has one of the poorest attitudes in baseball, was signed to a jaw-dropping, seven-year $91 million contract. With the signing, the rest of baseball's free agents are looking to get comparable money. The most notable treasure hunters are Bernie Williams, Mo Vaughn, Kevin Brown, Randy Johnson and Albert Belle.

WE ARE FAMILY?

In the last few weeks, the Toronto Blue Jays have fired two coaches and came close to firing either their pitching coach or their first-year manager. Since the end of the season, both the first and third base coaches have been replaced and General Manager Gord Ash has been forced to address the stability of the organization. Due to questions about manager Tim Johnson's credibility, Ash was forced to fire pitching coach Mel Queen and manager Tim Johnson into Toronto for a closed door meeting. This brings up a serious problem with the Blue Jays organization because they appear to be in a state of turmoil and this will make signing major free agents and trading for talent a challenge.

IF CHRISTMAS CAME EARLY...

- NHL cellar dwellers Tampa Bay and Calgary would wake up and see that Ted Nolan and Marc Crawford are still without coaching jobs.
- The Jays would treat Pat Hengren with the same class that he exhibits and stop messing with him.
- All the NFL people that doubted Doug Flutie would stand up and admit their blunder.

Gaels dominate Ravens
Men's soccer team wins battle for playoffs convincingly

By NEATE SAGER

On Sunday afternoon, in a game with the pressure and intensity of a playoff contest, one team could handle the heat, the other got out of the kitchen. With the victor securing a berth in the conference playoffs and the loser resigned to waiting for next season, Queen's utterly dismantled the Ravens by a count of 5-0.

Though a tie would have sufficed for ensuring his club a ticket to the postseason, Queen's co-coach Nik Thomas deemed it essential that the Gaels prevail outright. "We felt we had to establish ourselves immediately and keep the intensity going for the full 90 minutes, and as such we were able to put them away early."

Given the match's implications and the intense rivalry between the two clubs, emotions ran quite high on the pitch. Whereas the Gaels avoided yielding to temptation, the childish behaviour of the Ravens drew more whistles than a bad call at Wimbledon.

Team captain Mike Cowan attributed his teammates' restraint to the lessons imparted by longtime coach John Walker, who retired following the 1997 season. "Everything we do is in the shadow of his coaching," he said. "You never see a Queen's team get outworked or lose their cool."

With many outstanding defensive performances, Thomas cited defender Steve Curic for special honours. "He played the game of his career," he said. "He simply took over in the Queen's end."

With his confidence bolstered by the toil of Curic and cohorts, goalkeeper Alex Mueller-Gastell zealously corralled nearly every ball that entered his crease before the Ravens could so much as sniff a scoring opportunity.

The fourth-place Gaels will likely be perceived as an underdog in the OUA playoffs, which commence next Saturday, with Queen's facing either York or Toronto. "We've done well against both teams," remarked Thomas. "It comes down to what team wants it more... it's two [wins] to the national championships. The bottom line is, it's crunch time."

Two players battle for ball during Gaels 5-0 win on Sunday.

Putting your heart into it

By JULIETA LOEFFLER

For those who have decided to workout, it is important that to know how to workout safely and to get the maximum benefits for the time spent exercising. Exercising in your target heart rate zone helps to maximize calorie expenditure, increase your oxygen uptake (VO2 max) and to improve or maintain aerobic fitness.

Your heart rate is the number of beats per minute that your heart is beating. When you exercise, more oxygen is needed in your muscles. The oxygen comes from the air we breathe and then gets distributed into your blood. Since your heart pumps oxygenated blood throughout your body and brings deoxygenated blood back to your heart, it beats faster as more demand is placed on the muscles. The rate at which your heart is pumping is a good measure of the intensity of your workout.

To measure your pulse (heart rate), take your index and middle fingers on one hand and press lightly on the radial artery (close to your thumb) on the inside of your other wrist, or on your carotid artery (straight down from the corner of your eye, just under your jaw). Once you find a spot where you feel the pulsing, count the beats for 10 seconds. Multiply this number by six to get your heart rate per minute.

To train within your heart rate zone means to train at 60 to 90 percent of your maximum heart rate. To calculate what these numbers are, first subtract your age from 220. This will give you your predicted maximum heart rate. Multiply this number by 0.6 (the lower end of your range) and then multiply by 0.9 (the high end of your range). To get your optimal heart rates in 10 second readings, simply divide your 60 percent rate and your 90 percent rate by six.

The rate at which your heart is pumping is a good measure of the intensity of your workout.

When you first begin exercising, make sure you train at the lower end of the range, and if 60 percent still feels too strenuous, then slow down. A good way to determine if the activity you are participating in is too difficult for you is the talk test. If you are unable to keep up a conversation with a neighbour and you are out of breath, then you are exercising too hard.

Training in your zone ensures that you are training within a safe and effective level for your age and fitness level. You must pay attention to your body at all times. Signs of over-exertion are a pounding in your chest, dizziness, faintness or profuse sweating. If experience any of these signs, lower your intensity level. Make sure you cool down for five minutes or longer before ending your exercise session and don't forget to stretch.

A safe and effective workout will keep you healthy and make it possible for you to continue to exercise. Make sure that you are enjoying yourself while training. Pushing yourself and feeling the changes in your body is an extremely motivating and uplifting experience, give it a try today.

Gold medal Gaels

By ROBERT MACNEIL

This past weekend, the Queen's men's volleyball team showed their tremendous team depth by capturing the gold medal at their host tournament, the Queen's Invitational.

The Gaels defeated the University of New Brunswick in an exciting five set final match (2-15, 15-6, 9-15, 15-8 15-10). The MVP of the tournament was the Gaels' Michel Cameron who ran the offence throughout the weekend and was one of many standouts. Named to the all-star team were Frederic Cormier and Jake Magolan, who both showed that they bring a lot of talent to this young team. Other exceptional performances in the gold medal game were turned in by fourth-year veteran Kevin Latchford, who had 14 kills and a remarkable 0 errors, and Scott Millington who contributed 16 kills.

This is the second gold medal victory in a tournament for the Gaels, in addition to a bronze medal finish. According to Head Coach Brenda Willis, the real story to this early-season success is that the team is "so solid in every position." The team is off to its strongest start in years and are able to go to many positions for a kill. Willis feels, however, that the team must "work on blocking and tightening team defence."

With the strong start enjoyed by the team, the only persistent problem Willis is confronted with is deciding who has to sit and who gets to start. If the Gaels' toughest dilemma is having too many great players, then it looks like a very promising season.

Gaels give away game

By ADAM KAMINSKY

The Queen's Golden Gaels gave the Laval Rouge et Or the best housewarming present that they could have asked for, a playoff spot.

In their first trip up to Quebec City, the Gaels bumbled and bungled the game away, losing to the Rouge et Or by a 13-10 count. Queen's managed to lose this game despite the fact that the visitors dominated every statistical category, except for the final score.

Queen's offensive unit was able to move the ball with relative ease throughout the game, gaining a total of 441 total yards, however this ability to drive downfield was constantly undermined by mistakes inside Laval's territory. The most notable of these errors were two dropped touchdown passes and two interceptions inside the Laval 10-yard line.

"We had great stuff going up and down the field," said Head Coach Bob-Howes. "We just threw two interceptions near the endzone and weren't able to score."

With the Queen's offence and defence dominating the first-half, it was a moral victory for Laval to escape only trailing by a 10-3 count.

After Laval opened the scoring with a 22-yard field goal by linebacker/kicker Bernard Gravel, it was all Queen's. Gael kicker/receiver Ken Radcliffe responded by booting an 11-yard field goal late in the first quarter, a disappointing result after Queen's scrimmaged first and goal from inside the five-yard line.

The Gaels defence played as well as they had before the two-game series with Ottawa, holding the Rouge et Or at bay, while the Queen's offence tried to find their rhythm. The patience paid off when Queen's quarterback Beau Howes took it over from five-yards out with only 20 seconds left in the half.

The second-half started with a whimper, no points in the third quarter, and ended with a bang.

"We had great stuff going up and down the field, we just threw two interceptions near the endzone."

— Head Coach Bob Howes

Despite the lack of scoring in the third quarter, two significant events did transpire. Laval opted to replace ineffective starting quarterback Francois Chapedelaine with former Concordia star Dominique Goulet and Queen's veteran defensive back Max Tutnet was ejected for senselessly kneeing a Laval player in the groin in a skirmish following the whistle.

"[Max's ejection] was probably one of those reflex things, it isn't something Max would usually do," explained Howes. "It was a dumb penalty, no question, but there were several such penalties."

The Rouge et Or were able to capitalize on both of these personnel changes when they charged back in the fourth quarter. Laval first scored on a 32-yard Gravel field goal to cut the Queen's lead

Men's rugby

On Saturday afternoon, the men's rugby team completed its regular season with a 22-19 victory over McMaster. Despite the lackluster performance, the Tricolour finished with a 6-1 record, placing them second in the conference, behind Guelph. They are now gearing up for an OUA semi-final match-up with the hated Western Mustangs.

The second XV won their game 29-10. This win further solidified the teams spot as divisional champions.

Women's soccer

On Sunday afternoon, the women's soccer team completed their undefeated regular season and are cruising into the playoffs that will begin this weekend. Backstopping the team to a 4-0 victory over the Carleton Ravens was the stellar Amanda Foran. Now the number one ranked team in the CIAU must prepare themselves for the OUA Championships at Carleton University.

Women's lacrosse

In weekend lacrosse action, the women's team pummeled three teams as they clinched a first-place in their division. On Saturday, the Gaels beat the University of Toronto by a count of 8-2. Silvana Ye scored four goals and Meredith Gilbert added two. Later that day, the offence continued on cruise control when they crushed York 14-3. Ye got three more goals, and D'Arcy Speating and Anne Benedetti potted four goals each. Finally, the Gaels defeated McMaster in an exhibition tilt by a score of 8-2. Once again, Silvana Ye was poison for her opponents as she netted yet another four goals for a total of 11 on the weekend.

Men's hockey

The men's hockey team opened their regular season schedule this past weekend and registered ties in both games. On Friday night, the Gaels came from behind to tie the game at 4-4 and appeared to score the winning goal. However, the referee disallowed it because the net was pushed off its markers. Queen's players, to a man, were convinced that it was a Laurier player that knocked the net off. Scoring in the game were Wes Booket with two, and Rob Mailloux and Jonathan Bishop pocketing the others. Sunday afternoon saw the Gaels again come from behind to tie Waterloo 3-3. Mailloux added his second goal of the weekend, and Damien Gilbert and Aaron Knight completed the scoring.

Women's volleyball

In hosting the Queen's Invitational tournament this past weekend, the women's volleyball team looked to win some hardware and pulled off a silver medal game to Sherbrooke. On the way to the final, Queen's defeated Waterloo, Brock and Carleton. The Gaels had two of their talented players, Kristine Spekkens and Lindsay Barrett, named to the all-star team.

Field hockey

The squad travelled to the OUA Championships in Toronto and came out with a fifth place finish. After an early loss to Guelph, 4-1, with the lone goal coming off of the stick of Jill Connell, the Gaels were able to rebound with a win. Queen's defeated Western 4-3 in extra strokes, to earn their final standing. Two players were named to the OUA second all-star team, Carolyn Fitzgerald and Amber Palmer.

Women's tennis

Queen's first OUA champions of the 1998-99 season are the women's tennis team. They won this championship in convincing fashion, defeating the University of Toronto 4-0 and then the McGill Martlets 4-1.

This comes a year after the team came a little short of their goal, despite being the regular season champs.

Men's basketball

The team travelled to Ottawa for the Tipoff Classic and defeated the Laval Rouge et Or 83-80. This improves the team's preseason record to 2-1.

No win, no problem

BY STEFAN MURRAY

Although they were unable to chalk up a win last weekend, the Queen's women's hockey team's opening two games against the University of Toronto were considered a success.

The Gaels lost a 3-2 heartbreaker on Saturday, then battled to a 2-2 tie on Sunday to escape their series with the heavily-favoured Blues with a single point.

Toronto 2 Queen's 2

"U of T is the powerhouse in this league" said Co-coach Jacques Tremblay. "Tying them [on Sunday] is a big-big win."

On Saturday night, the Gaels struck early when forward Meridith Amin bested the Toronto keeper on a clear break from centre, but were then surprised by three unanswered goals by the Blues, two of which came on beautiful individual efforts. The Gaels rallied again in the third to make the final minutes interesting, but were unable to equal the score.

In Sunday's effort, the Gaels were able to attain a tie when Jess Mullen deked a falling Blues goalie with five minutes remaining in regulation time, knotting the score at two goals apiece and capping an entertaining and emotional three periods.

Goaltending clearly characterized both games for the Gaels as rookie Claudia Tom made big save after big save, stonewalling the Blues on Saturday to keep her team in the game and continuing her dominant play on Sunday, turning away several Toronto shooters to secure the tie.

"Claudia was looking very impressive" said Tremblay, "especially as a first-year and a walk-on."

Unfortunately, Tom's performance could not overcome the Gaels shortcomings in the special-teams department. The Gaels couldn't capitalize on any of their power-play opportunities this weekend while giving up a power-play and a short-handed marker to the Blues. Their failure on the power-play seemed to inspire the Blues and made it harder to play catch-up after falling behind.

"U of T is the powerhouse in this league, tying them [on Sunday] is a big-big win."

— Co-coach Jacques Tremblay

Regardless of the Gaels' difficulty putting pucks into the net, their result this weekend was unexpected and did wonders to improve the team's confidence.

"On Saturday our team board read 'We don't care who you are,'" related Tremblay "[but] after Saturday's game it read 'We know who you are and we're going to beat you.'"

The Gaels travel to Waterloo this weekend to play their first road games of the season against the Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks. If they continue their defensive prowess and can bulge the twine more frequently during their two-game set, it's likely they can put up a few in the "W" column.

shot at the tackle but the referee was in the way, it was one of those days."

In spite of the loss, the Golden Gaels saw a variety of players put up excellent individual efforts. Defensively, fourth-year Phys-ed student, Tewsley intercepted two balls and recovered a fumble, and defensive end Derek Spronck was a force all game. On the offensive side of the ball, all-conference running back Paul Correale sprung for 95 yards on the ground, while Nepean native James MacLean paced the air attack, catching six passes for 105 yards.

"[Turner's] was a dumb penalty, no question, but there were several such penalties."

"The team played hard all game and we were in a position where we could win, but their athletic receiver made a big play," lamented coach Howes. "[Safety] Andrew Tewsley even had a

With the Laval Rouge et Or celebrating the first playoff berth in their three year existence, the Golden Gaels are left to refocus on their final game of the regular season against Bishop's. ## Clark provides a home for House, Rave and Techno

BY TANIA HAAS

Bodies groovin'-collective movin'-beats blazin' and all was happenin' Saturday night.

Location: Clark Hall Pub, modernized Why? Well let's Disc-us. Every Saturday night, up those familiar flight of stairs, the record spinning of house music occurs and an exhausting escape from the Queen's club scene can be found. It's Disc-us, Clark Hall Pub's newest experiment in the house/techno environment.

I must admit that I am part of the Queen's majority that tends to spend time and money on the overcrowded dance floors that play the usual hip-hop, rock and techno. I am also a self-confessed Rick Dees' top 40 loyal listener. Surprisingly enough, not one overplayed Border song was heard at Disc-us. Instead, DJ Poa, DJ Melt, James and Boyd spun tunes that were both spirit intoxicating and strangely mellowing.

The Kingston house scene, led by Groovenation, has been growing for over two years. Every Saturday the grooves are heard live to air from 9 - 10 p.m. on CFRC. Then the beats are continued all night at Clark.

Here, dancing is the result of good music. Raving is the expression of dancers appreciation of the energy. The moves are sometimes odd but always unique, and often mesmerizing.

With psychedelic technicolour gel cells floating on the floor and screen, and palpitating lights on the walls and ceiling, the floor beckoned to be danced upon. Amid the lights and moving bodies, dry ice diffused into the air, as Harrison Ford's face graced the pub's screen while they played a muted technicolour Blade Runner. The combination of the futuristic androids on screen and the mechanical music created an intense progressive atmosphere. As I sat there, I was surprisingly calmed by the loud bass. Some say house has a magical effect because the main rhythm mimics the beat of the heart.

The show attracted a new group for Clark and a different scene for the Queen's minority.

Incomparable to Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, the Kingston house scene is not solid, but the interest is expanding. The crowd maxed out at 50 people on Saturday. The show attracted a new group for Clark and a different scene for the Queen's minority.

I was both intrigued by this new experience and inspired that a Rick Dees fan could learn how to rave with the growing spinning scene at Queen's University.

Players warm up Queen's Players prepare for exciting new year

THEATRE REVIEW

BY JOANNA SHARP

As I walked into the MacLaughlin room in the John Deutsch University Centre to watch a rehearsal for an upcoming Queen's Player's performance, I had no idea what to expect. But after sitting down and watching the troupe choreograph a dance routine, I was really impressed.

"There's one line that's been in every one of our shows, but you'll have to watch to find out!"

— Jackie Leggett, show director

Their upcoming performance is entitled Cheubacca to the Future, but what that means for the show is anyone's guess.

"The title is a secret among the cast," said Jackie Leggett, the show's director. It is a Queen's Players tradition to keep the title a secret to spark interest around campus.

"It's all about traditions," Leggett explained. "There's one line that's been in every one of our shows, but you'll have to watch to find out!" The story line is also a well kept secret; however, from watching these energetic people rehearse, I could tell that their performance promises to be upbeat and wacky.

Some of you might be wondering, as I was, what exactly is Queen's Players? "It's just fun!" stated Robyn Thompson, president of Queen's Players.

Leggett added that the troupe's personality is "not serious, but it's really hard to define. The easiest way to put it is that people love [Queen's Players productions] because it's a great time."

When asked how they create their storylines, Thompson answered that they "take two to three pop culture ideas, smooth them together, have some beer and a good laugh."

The troupe's material is written and produced by the students themselves. The cast is composed of twelve members; six males and females, in addition to the director, writer, producer and choreographer.

Approximately two to three times a year, the group puts on an extraordinarily energetic production that takes place in either Alfie's or Clark Hall Pub.

The opening night for Cheubacca to the Future is November 18 and is an all ages event. Leggett stresses that this is a great opportunity for first-year students who are not aware of Queen's Players to come out and see what it's all about.

"The great thing about our group is that upper year students do not have an advantage over first year students," explained Leggett. "All cast members must audition for every production and we like to think of ourselves as one big group. There's a great chemistry between all of us."

"[To create storylines] take two to three pop culture ideas, smooth them together, have some beer and a good laugh."

— Robyn Thompson, president of Queen's Players

Auditions for the next Queen's Players production will be sometime in the winter and everyone is welcome to try out. A great way to see if you're interested is to watch Cheubacca to the Future.

The show may seem like a mystery now, but if it is as off-beat as their rehearsals, the audience members should have a great time trying to fit the pieces of the puzzle together.

Cheubacca to the Future will be playing from November 18 - 21 at Alfie's and November 26 - 28 at Clark Hall Pub. Tickets can be purchased at the Used Book Store for $6.

Eclectica-ly charged

Exhibit packed with uplifting and elevated work

De-eclectic-able: Eclectica Gallery plays home to the extensive work of Gord Smith (above) and Ghitta Caiserman-Roth (below).

By MARINA HESS

Ani DiFranco found religion in the greeting card aisle, and I found it in downtown Kingston at Eclectica Gallery. Gord Smith, a sculptor, and Ghitta Caiserman-Roth, a painter, are the subjects of a current retrospective at the gallery.

Smith and Caiserman-Roth are both distinguished Canadian artists with years of shows, commissions and awards behind them. Notably, Smith is the creator of the Expo '67 sculpture Canada Screen, a massive testament to the breadth of this nation.

Both Smith and Caiserman-Roth incorporate religious imagery into their art: crosses in Smith's creation Amen, Caiserman-Roth's use of a Star of David and other Jewish artifacts. I, however, found a spirituality in the more secular pieces, a personal spirituality born of the dreams and experiences of long, full lives.

Caiserman-Roth told me at the gallery to remember that each piece has its own history. There were, however, commonalities evident in the collection. The themes of freedom, ascension and flight in Smith's sculptures produce a feeling of the spirit taking wing. Caiserman-Roth's focus is on the tangible aspects of life. In still-life arrangements she creates a religious order. There is, also, a sense of sadness emanating from many of the paintings.

Studio Still Life-Spring focuses on a plant, painted bright, lush and green, an apt summation of the season.

Smith's pieces were primarily cast bronze, though some were welded steel. The colour of the bronze glinting in the afternoon light gave a sunburnt hue to his work. This especially enhanced the two sculptures of the mythological character Icarus, the son of Daedalus, whose folly brought him close to the sun and then hurled him into the ocean.

Icarus depicts the ascent towards the heavens. The lines of the piece are sharp and concise, giving it a streamlined appearance. Wings open in glory, Icarus is exalting in his moment of absolute freedom. Taking flight is a dream that lifts the minds' of many people stuck on earth. Smith has captured the dream in his representation.

In contrast, Icarus shows the dishonourable descent. The piece is much smaller, and the texture quite different, more nubly than smooth. This adds to the melting, withering language of the body. Only one wing is identifiable, making the sculpture seem off-balance. Icarus painfully falls back to earth.

Rather than looking to myth, Caiserman-Roth often turns to her studio for inspiration. Studio Still Life-Spring focuses on a plant, painted bright, lush and green, an apt summation of the season. Yet I found myself distracted by the whitewashed figures in the background. The shadowy shapes did not embody the open-mouthed anguish of such paintings as Unfolding. Still, considering Caiserman-Roth's work, I couldn't help thinking of the last line of Anne Michaels' poem Modersohn-Becker: "every painting is way of saying goodbye."

This Woolf has teeth

Domino Theatre bites into a great rendition of a classic

By SCOTT DEVEAU

Finally I have found some decent theatre in Kingston. The Domino Theatre is presenting Edward Albee's Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? and it is a gem of a production.

I first encountered this play years ago during a period in which I was suffering from a bit of a fetish for Elizabeth Taylor and had watched the movie adaptation of the play. Although at the time I was still struggling with the text, I was fully enthralled by the overfed sex-kitten characterization Liz Taylor gave to Martha.

It was much later that I realized that this play had a depth beyond mere fetishes for one of its players.

Edward Albee is undoubtedly one of the quintessential playwrights of our time and Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? is his masterpiece.

The Domino Theatre, under the direction of Joan E. Jones, has done this play justice and should not go unrecognized. Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? explores the insecurities of love and sex in the stale marriage of the protagonists, Martha and George, and is extended into a more general context with introduction of their guests, Nick and Honey.

The text is a mesh of embittered sarcasm and destructive innuendoes, which take an almost cannibalistic form at times.

The play takes place in Martha and George's living room during a post-faculty party/all night drinking binge. Martha has invited Nick, a new professor from the university that George works at, and his wife Honey over, throwing the young couple into the chaotic world of their hosts' problems. We soon find out that Martha is a vicious bitch who is trying to destroy George, the only activity she enjoys, because of his inability to actualize her illusions of him.

The main premise of the play is suggested in a line which George speaks when Martha is attacking him with the statement, "truth or an illusion, George; you don't know the difference," and he responds with, "No; but we must carry on as though we did."

This line sums up the non-existence of a son that only exists in what he symbolizes for the characters — a cause of conflict.

For Martha, their son is a representation of everything George is not — beautiful, caring, young, and a lover of a sort. For George the son is something sacred that Martha and he alone share, a unity of sex and love.

First and foremost, the set is nothing short of brilliant. While the text does not require a complicated set, Liz Schell, the set designer, has successfully dropped the fourth wall of Martha and George's living room, a move that is absolutely fundamental to the intimacy required for this play.

The players were infallible (or at least appeared so) with special notice going to Gord Love's portrayal of George and his representation of a character whose centrality to the play I had failed to notice. Jones's slight deviation from the original script works in presenting her interpretation and also breaks the play up into two intermissions.

Speaking of intermissions, the Domino Theatre really knows how to keep an audience interested in a play about a late night drinking party. By providing a cash bar with which you can finish a glass of wine or a beer in enough time to get you back into the theatre before the next act begins, they have really added something to the theatrical experience.

All in all this presentation of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? was just stellar and I have to thank the Domino Theatre for presenting some of the best theatre I have seen since arriving in Kingston.

PLAY REVIEW

Ghost Train
 Theatre 5
 Selected performances until October 31

By BRAD LEPP

Ghost Train isn't witty. Ghost Train isn't controversial. Ghost Train isn't even clever. But, the point is, it doesn't pretend to be any of these things.

In the past, Theatre 5, has done such literary plays as Turn of the Screw and Frankenstein for their annual Halloween production, but this year they have tried something different. In an attempt to play to a wider audience, the production team looked for a light comedy that would receive a laugh as well as a scream. Ghost Train, a comedy, mystery and thriller written by Arthur Ridley was first performed in the 1930s, and still remains popular with repertory and amateur theatre companies.

Set in the 1930s the plot revolves around a group of five passengers who, because they missed their connection, are left at a haunted train station overnight. The ensemble consists of two newlyweds who miss their honeymoon, an older bickering couple, and of course, an off-the-wall busybody old man. The Station Master eventually winds up dead on the platform shortly after telling the passengers the ghost story of a terrible train wreck that happened 20 years ago to the day. That's when things really get haunting. I won't spoil the ending of the play for you, but if you've ever watched Scooby-Doo then it will quickly become clear.

Doug Steward, a local radio personality in his first major theatre performance, steals the show as the old man. Steward and the rest of the cast have been working intensely at rehearsals for the past six weeks in order to get the production underway, but they have enjoyed themselves.

"Many of the actors have very little experience, so it has been a process," said director Frances Berry, but it has been fun."

It is this process that Berry feels sets Theatre 5 apart from others in the area. Through acting classes and other courses offered, actors train and then have a chance to perform. There is a sense of community and intimacy felt on the small stage.

Admittedly, there are flaws. The set designer forgot to put a masking behind the open door and windows, and it's hard to believe that no one gets wet throughout the entire thunderstorm. The plot drags while the writer attempts a far too intellectual dismount, but put that aside and you have a fun show. It is somewhat refreshing to see actors who are human beings, and to watch a play that doesn't require much analysis.

The plot drags while the writer attempts a far too intellectual dismount, but put that aside and you have a fun show. It is somewhat refreshing to see actors who are human beings, and to watch a play that doesn't require much analysis.

Berry has changed the original script in an attempt to bring the play a bit closer to home. The passengers now come from Kingston Ontario, and actor/alumni Steve Powell sports a Queen's University cardigan. New music composed by James King and access to a wider sound effects library round off the updates to the production. Though relatively simple, the haunting effects admittedly made me jump once or twice. I found myself laughing in enjoyment at the characters.

Ghost Train will not leave you contemplating German Philosophy. Ghost Train might not even leave you frightened. But as some of the finest amateur theatre around, Ghost Train will make you laugh.

CHAPTER IV: THE ANECDOTE

rise to our next category.

Anecdotes in some situations can be used as verbal weapons in a never-ending game of "one-upmanship". The more combative the tone of the conversation, the more detailed the anecdotal weapons will be, but each detail in an anecdote of person one represents a weakness and offers itself up as a detail that can be bettered by person two. Some otherwise honest individuals have even been known to intentionally exaggerate past experiences tering anecdote but does not want to appear boastful, the adept social agent (in this case referred to as the primary agent) can pass on responsibility for the telling of an anecdote to a friend (chapter I) who, in telling the story, becomes the secondary agent. The result is that the primary agent receives all the rewards of the object's awareness of this flattering story without it being tainted by an air of arrogance. It is interesting to note that, in practice, this type of anecdote is usually initiated by the secondary agent as a gesture of good will towards the primary (thus calling into question my nomenclature). Very often, the secondary agent will tell the anecdote of their own accord to a romantic inter-

This final type of anecdote is characterized by a speaker who is unaware of any other tools of communication besides the anecdote, his or her only reply to "What do I say?" being "I should tell a witty and flattering anecdote." On first glance the harmless indulgence of the vain, these anecdotes are in all truth an insidious threat to the generally accepted paradigm of bilateral social action and multi-participant conversation (chapter I). The agent has lost all sense of his audience as conversational partners and regards them instead as a set of objects or receptacles for his or her anecdotal discharge. A nervous energy usually plagues users of this type of anecdote and causes an agonized and restless appearance when they are forced into the role of listener. Many clinical behaviorists describe such individuals as simply displaying an extension of the combative type of anecdote such that they simply draw on details of their past stories for benchmarks to surpass in their current ones. Alternately, one could argue that these agents are playing both conversational roles, speaker and listener, at once; they are talking to themselves. An interesting result of taking the latter view is that the listener is now no longer agent or object, speaker or listener; indeed the listener is no longer even a part of the conversation. This is ample justification for simply walking away should the listener become bored or uninterested.

With a firm grasp on the intricacies of the notion of an anecdote as a social tool, we can now move on confidently to chapter five, an in-depth analysis of the quotation of poetry in social situations. The central issue will be the age-old worry that quoting poetry in a social context will always be as pompous and obnoxious as it is now.

As I HAVE MENTIONED before, adept social creatures constantly ask themselves questions to determine the proper course of action within a social situation. One of these questions, and one that should always be floating around the mind to avoid the embarrassment of a social error is "Is it my turn to speak?" Incorrect answers to this relatively simple question have meant ruin for countless men, women, armies, nations and constitutional amendments. For example, what would the current state of national politics be had Elijah Harper decided that it would be best to keep his mouth shut instead of reminding the Manitoba legislature of native Canadians? The Meech Lake Inter-Provincial Happy Fun Trail would already be built and all would be good. Sometimes, however, the polite and mature individual comes to the conclusion that it is indeed their turn to speak as judged by conventional social paradigms (see chapter XII). It is at this point that the ugly question, "What do I say?" rears its head.

Depending on the state of conversation (see chapter II) at this point, the answer can be as varied as a greeting, a joke, a rebuttal, an insult, a yelp of surprise, a question, a groan of pleasure, etc. In many situations and with many people, a useful tool for today's confident social agent is the anecdote. Under the guise of entertaining them, one can use an anecdote to convey to one's social objects/co-agents (see other people chapter I) information that is valuable in its role of establishing or strengthening a positive impression of one's self in the mind of the object.

Anecdotes are easily recognizable by their structure as stories dealing largely with the speaker and/or other related agents. The observant listener will be able to identify, within the set of stories that constitute anecdotes, five distinct types corresponding to five possible motivations for telling the story.

1. THE INFORMAL
Usually reserved for closely related social agents (e.g.

This traditional form of anecdote is appropriate in many situations where agents share no social past. The anecdote serves the dual purpose of maintaining the conversation and exposing to the listener information which can be used to create an impression of the speaker. Predictably, these anecdotes are usually delivered in a polite and subdued manner so that the potential friend, lover, etc. will not think the speaker anything but normal (see How to be normal pp.27). One is expected and bound by convention to use anecdotes about ordinary, inoffensive events (if the anecdote should follow logically from the immediately preceding topic of conversation or be related in an obvious way) or about extraordinary, inoffensive events (if "Will they really care?" can be answered in the affirmative). The thought of a person breaking with this tradition of politeness gives in the interest of winning the perceived contest. One is reminded of the Monty Python sketch in which four wealthy men reminisce about their impoverished childhoods, each trying to convey a more dismal picture of their youth than the others by exaggerating details. Ezekiel ends up telling the other three, "I had to get up in the morning at 10 o'clock at night half-an-hour before I went to bed, eat a lump of poison, work 29 hours a day at t'mill and pay boss to let us work, come home, and each night dad used to kill us and dance about on our graves, singing." Needless to say, Ezekiel won.

The most socially complex of the five types, the indirect anecdote involves a minimum of three parties whereas the others involve a minimum of only two. In a situation in which a person wishes to relate a very flat-

Former WW/WN editor's appeal rejected

BY FIONA STEVENSON

Jason Teske's appeal of his recent termination from the position of WW/WN co-editor has been denied. "As far as the AMS is concerned, it's a done deal," said Trevor Ogle, chairman of the Alma Mater Society Board of Directors.

"I really wasn't expecting to get my job back. The policy was pretty cut and dry on that."

— Jason Teske, former WW/WN editor

Teske was fired by the AMS on October 14 because he is not enrolled as a student at Queen's. In February, when he was hired as the layout/design manager for WW/WN Publications, Teske was a full-time student at Queen's. However, over the summer, Teske learned he could not return to Queen's because he had exceeded the maximum number of failed courses permitted by the university.

Section 2 of the AMS hiring policy states that all salaried student employees of the AMS must be enrolled in at least two credits and have paid the full slate of mandatory student activity fees. People receiving AMS wages or honoraria need to have paid full student fees and be enrolled in three courses.

"According to the AMS employment policy manual, any one that is fired has within 72 hours of being fired, the right to appeal that decision to the chair of the Board of Directors," explained Ogle. Teske filed his appeal to Ogle on October 16.

In accordance with section 5.06 of the AMS Employee Policy and Procedures Manual, a hearing was conducted on October 20. The hearing was attended by Teske, AMS Information Officer Greg McKellar, and the hiring committee, made up of AMS General Manager Claude Sherren, Media and Services Director Owen Minns and Vice-President (Operations) Gord Moodie, responsible for hiring and firing Teske.

Security releases details of assault

BY FIONA STEVENSON

On Wednesday evening Campus Security released information regarding an assault which occurred on campus on October 13.

At approximately 3 p.m., a female student was walking through the quadrangle on the west side of Clark Hall when she was grabbed from behind. The assailant made threatening comments of a sexual nature, then turned and ran away.

According to Sue Wagar, campus relations and development coordinator at Campus Security, the timing of the assault is "quite unusual," especially in light of the fact that it occurred in a busy area on campus.

The assailant is described as male, white, 5'10" to 6' tall, wearing a blue jacket and white sneakers. The male did not have long hair and appeared to be under 30 years of age.

This is one of three assaults or attempted assaults to have occurred on campus this term.

In the first on-campus assault, a female student was attacked on University Avenue on October 3 at approximately 11 p.m. In a separate incident that occurred on October 21 at approximately 4 a.m., a female student was walking down Lower Albert Street when she was approached by a male standing in the side yard of a nearby house. According to Constable Mike Shultz of the Kingston Police, both victims were able to escape without serious assault or injury.

"It would be nice if it was one person so we could get this person and have this under control."

— Sue Wagar, campus relations and development coordinator, Campus Security

The perpetrator in both instances was described as well-built and approximately six feet tall.

Wagar said whether the two cases are related is still undetermined. "There's always that possibility that they are linked... The time we'll be able to tell is when we catch this individual or these individuals," she said.

"It would be nice if it was one person so we could get this person and have this under control," Wagar added.

Security advisories are not released

Faculty mourns loss of education professor

BY RENÉE HUANG

Faculty, staff and students of Queen's University are mourning the loss of Professor Arthur L. Mandell. Mr. Mandell, an influential and well-liked associate professor of education, passed away Saturday at Kingston General Hospital as a result of a brain aneurysm.

Acting Assistant Dean for the Faculty of Education Don Campbell recalls Mr. Mandell's contributions to the faculty and the field of education law. "Arthur's counsel was always wise and to the point and he has left a very important mark on the faculty," he said.

"Arthur's counsel was always wise and to the point and he has left a very important mark on the faculty."

— Don Campbell, acting assistant dean, faculty of education

As a founding member of the faculty, then called McArthur College, Mr. Mandell came to Queen's in 1969 to teach philosophy. "He became quite concerned with legal issues and children in school," and went on to complete a law degree at Queen's, Campbell said. Mr. Mandell influenced and touched his colleagues, Campbell said, and extended his knowledge to all education students. He was the only staff member instructing the Legal Issues course for teacher candidates.

"Arthur's understanding of the law was coupled by his continual support of students and the teaching profession,"

AMS pushes for student aid reform in Toronto

By STEPHANIE CARVIN

Three representatives from the Alma Mater Society and engineering student Chris Chmelyk took education issues into their own hands during a road trip to Queen's Park Wednesday.

Chmelyk is a second-year chemical engineering student who will not be able to continue with his studies unless he is able to secure some form of student aid.

Chmelyk, AMS President Tom Stanley, Academic Affairs Commissioner Milan Konopek and Deputy Academic Affairs Commissioner Aaron Lazarus made the trip to Queen's Park to meet with members of the Ontario Legislature. Their goal was to raise awareness about students in situations similar to Chmelyk's and push for student aid reform. The meeting was also intended to be a follow-up to the AMS executive's meeting with Education Minister David Johnson on July 23. However, Johnson refused to meet with the Queen's representatives this Wednesday.

The trip coincided with a press conference by New Democratic Party leader Howard Hampton. Hampton unveiled the first of a series of party commitments in the run-up to the next provincial election that would roll back college and university tuition by 10 per cent. The conference was attended by Chmelyk and the AMS representatives as well as approximately 20 representatives from universities and student organizations from across Ontario. The NDP proposed to finance the tuition roll back by "taking back the Harris tax cut from the province's most well-off, the six per cent of Ontarians with taxable incomes over $80,000," said Hampton. He justified this plan by arguing that "most people... would rather restore quality education, and health care" over having a tax cut. According to Hampton, implementing this plan would raise an estimated $1.5 billion.

At the conference, Hampton signed his commitment in front of the media and students that were present.

When asked by The Journal if the NDP had any plans for reform to student aid such as OSAP or an income sensitive model for loan repayment, Hampton said, "We'll deal with it at a later date."

After the conference, Stanley, Konopek and Chmelyk met with Wayne Lessard, one of the NDP education critics. In the meeting, Stanley called the NDP's plan "a good step forward" and said "the initiative is really laudable."

However, Stanley said he was concerned the NDP plan did not address quality of education or student aid which to him is "the key for long-term problems."

Lessard replied that while there are "not a lot of details" on the full plan of the NDP, "there will be future announcements made to provide further details." The NDP would rather increase the grant proportion of student aid rather than introduce an income sensitive model which "is not the platform of the NDP," he added.

Most of the student organizations spoke highly of the NDP's plan after the conference.

"It's a step in the right direction and it is realistic," said Andrew Boggs, executive

CLARIFICATION

On September 18, 1998 The Queen's Journal published an article in the Opinions section entitled "Road to Hell is Paved" that included a reference to Paul Morrison.

The opinions expressed therein are solely those of the writer and do not reflect the views or opinions of The Queen's Journal.

CORRECTIONS

In the last issue, the AMS employees referred to in an article on status checks included waged employees, who must be enrolled in at least three credits and have paid full mandatory student fees.

In an article about Mental Health Awareness Week in issue 14, the committee responsible for organizing events was misnamed. It was the Mental Health Awareness Committee.

In the review of the Studio 102 presentation of "Bringing It All Home" in issue 15, the time period in which the play was set was misidentified. It was the late 1960s.

The Journal regrets the errors.

Constables revamp Alfie's glassware policy

Date rape drug scare leads to ban on drinks outside washrooms

By MAGGIE BUHAJCYK

Recent reports that the date rape drug may be in Kingston have led to a revamped glassware policy at Alfie's Pub.

"If one of these people wants to put the drug in your drink, they will follow you to the washroom and put it in when it's on the ledge."

— AMS Services Director Sarah Armstrong

The policy, which prohibits patrons from taking their drinks into Alfie's washrooms has raised concerns among members of the university community as the policy forces patrons to leave their drinks unattended outside the washrooms.

"It is a serious problem... If one of these people wants to put the drug in your drink, they will follow you to the washroom and put it in when it's on the ledge," said Sarah Armstrong, Alma Mater Society Services Director.

Although Queen's Student Constables are normally stationed outside of the washrooms, Chief Constable Scott McCann said the constables are not responsible for watching individual drinks.

"We thought that it would be difficult to ask one person to monitor others drinks," Armstrong explained.

In co-operation with Armstrong, QSC has developed a new solution to the problem.

According to McCann, the constables will no longer allow glassware to enter the hallway leading up to the washrooms. Also, the table outside the washrooms at Alfie's was recently removed in order to decrease the amount of unattended space in that area.

McCann said he hopes that decreasing this space will prevent people from leaving their drinks in areas which are difficult to monitor.

"If people know they can't leave their drinks on the ledge, they'll be more inclined to leave them with friends," McCann explained.

Along with Campus Security, the Student Constables have also taken steps to educate students. "We have put up posters in the bar right by the bathroom which is the usual problem area for drinks," McCann said.

Student reaction to the change is varied.

"My mom always told me never to leave your drinks unattended," said Sabrina DiVincenzo, Eng '01. "The problem is that sometimes, when you're ready to go to the washroom, it might be hard to find your friends."

"I think that the best solution would be to let them take drinks to the washroom, but if that's not possible than I would rather leave it with my friends," she continued.

"I'd rather leave my drink with my friends," said Shannon Dent, Artsci '01. "If I ever leave my drink, I won't drink the rest of it," she added.

Despite student reservations, Armstrong is satisfied with the new solution. "The best way to solve the problem is to eliminate places where people can drop the drug in [a drink]," she said. "People have to assume some responsibility for their actions. You can't leave a drink with a stranger."

Armstrong said the policy banning drinks from pub washrooms is not likely to be changed. "You can't monitor people's drinking if they are drinking in the washrooms," she said.

McCann agreed, pointing out that the policy is intended to improve safety. "Glassware breaking or spilling can lead to accidents. Fights can also break out in the bathroom and glass is a handy weapon," he said.

Male applicant stirs debate at Feminist Review

By JONATHAN TINNEY

A precedent-setting decision made earlier this week allowed a male student to become a member of Queen's Feminist Review's editorial board, even though his application stirred controversy among committee members.

"I didn't realize I would be the first or anything. I mean I'm an English major, I've taken a few Women's Studies courses and I had a genuine interest in the issues," said board member Eric Singer, Arts '99.

The Feminist Review, a publication devoted to the exhibition and promotion of female creative writing, is produced annually by the Alma Mater Society Social Issues Commission.

"We usually have six to eight volunteers. This time we just didn't get that many initially," said Naomi Brunemeyer, AMS social issues commissioner. "So I put flyers out inviting everyone out. There is often an interview process, but there were not enough volunteers to make that necessary."

While there is no official rule excluding men from the publication's editorial board, a male has never applied for a position in The Review's six-year history. "My personal feelings are that The Review is a forum for a diversity of voices, and I believe that includes male voices," said Brunemeyer.

Committee member Jocelyn Heisel said she was strongly opposed to the addition of Singer to the editorial board. "A male as editor may harm The Review's role as a safe space for woman's thoughts," she explained.

A two-hour debate concerning whether or not The Review was a "woman's only space" took place last week.

The committee discussed the possibility that some women may be reluctant to submit works if they were to be judged by a man. "It is important [for The Review] to hear all women's voices, to lose even one would be very unfortunate," said Heisel.

Many of the other members on the board initially supported the inclusion of Singer on the committee, but agreed with Heisel's points.

Brunemeyer made the final call, allowing Singer to remain on the board, a decision based on AMS policy. "It came down to a question of equality. The AMS mandate is not to exclude volunteers on the basis of race, gender or religion. I had to go by that," said Brunemeyer.

Heisel and Singer said no hard feelings have resulted from the debate. "I didn't take it personally," Singer said. "The arguments were about issues, not personalities."

First-year applications may double in 2003

By SHAWN BRIMLEY

In 2003, applications to Queen's are expected to double, and the administration is still uncertain as to how this influx will be handled.

As a result of the phasing out of the OAC level in Ontario high schools in 1998, the last OAC class and the first graduating grade 12 class will be applying to colleges and universities at the same time.

"The double cohort problem will have a ripple effect that will spread out the problem over a few years."

— Daniele Gauvin, Ministry of Education and Training

This situation is termed the double cohort problem and is just beginning to be addressed by universities across the province.

"The high school curriculum has been changed to a four-year program which is a more modern, rigorous curriculum," said Daniele Gauvin, from the Ontario Ministry of Education and Training.

In the October 5 issue of The Toronto Star, the number of extra applicants to universities and colleges across Canada was estimated at 45,000.

"We have to deal with this directly... this is a serious policy matter," said Professor Patrick Oosthuizen, Queen's academic colleague on the Council of Ontario Universities.

"The university is already under pressure to increase enrolment in electrical engineering and computer science," said Oosthuizen. "When we have to deal with the increased enrolment in 2003, it will only compound the problem."

When asked if the university plans to build new facilities such as residences, Oosthuizen said, "that is definitely the area where a lot of the discussion will take place over the next few years."

However, Oosthuizen said he doubts the actual number of applicants will double in 2003. "The problem may be spread out over two or three years, as high school students tend to spread their load [of OAC's] over a couple of years," said Oosthuizen. "I don't think it is going to be an actual doubling, but we are definitely looking in the area of 50 to 75 per cent."

Gauvin agreed, saying, "The double cohort problem will have a ripple effect that will spread out the problem over a few years."

To deal with the increased financial pressures on colleges and universities as a result of the double cohort problem, the Ontario Ministry of Education and Training plans to increase funding to colleges and universities.

"The funds that are saved from not having the OAC level in 2003, will be reinvested at the post-secondary level... to make sure that everything goes smoothly," said Gauvin.

"We still don't fully understand the nature of the problem," said Oosthuizen. "It will be high on the agenda next year."

Listserv to inform students about security

By JOCELYN LAPORTE

Campus Security has established a listserv, a group e-mail service that students can subscribe to if they wish to receive security alerts. The listserv provides immediate notification of alerts or other important security information.

"It grew out of a conversation I had over the summer... talking about ways of increasing security information," said Alison Loat, AMS vice-president (operations). "I brought it to the security advisory committee and they set it up."

The listserv, created by Campus Security, is called ALERT-L. Sue Wagar, campus relations and development coordinator with Campus Security, chose this name to have the service appear at the top of the listserv, making it the first one people will see.

Patrons must subscribe to the listserv, ensuring everyone receiving it is interested in security information. The opt-in feature "is good because there is that initiative that students have to make," said Loat.

Wagar said the listserv will be treated the same as any other contact on the security distribution list. When incidents occur that require hasty notification to a number of groups, ALERT-L will function to inform subscribers with ease.

In co-operation with Information Technology Services, the new listserv will be announced to all subscribers of other listservs at Queen's. The listserv will be maintained and updated by Campus Security. The information offered will be analogous to the security bulletins posted on and around campus.

"[The listserv] will hopefully be up by Monday," Wagar speculated. Students and staff will be able to subscribe to the service at that time.

"You'll be advised of something [security incidents] that happens on campus without doing legwork," said Wagar. "It's an easy way of finding out [information]."

Interested individuals may subscribe to the listserv through the Queen's Security homepage at <http://www.queensu.ca/security/>.

stated Rena Uptis, dean of the Faculty of Education, in a statement yesterday. "He was an acknowledged authority on legal issues surrounding child abuse and labour relations in education."

Mr. Mandell was responsible for creating a course devoted to children's rights and labour relations, added Campbell.

In the statement, Uptis also emphasized Mr. Mandell's "lifelong passion for linguistic precision." Mr. Mandell was devoted to teaching and to his students. He administered student fellowships, was a member of Senate, presented professional development sessions to associate teachers and contributed regularly to the Alumni Association.

Mr. Mandell will be remembered for his constant presence in the Queen's community and for the overwhelming impact of his contributions. Uptis wrote, "We have lost much more than a colleague. We have lost a friend."

without the victim's consent, Wagat explained, which is why the information has just been released. "We always wait to get their permission. Their feelings and their comfort level is the most important thing."

"She just wasn't comfortable at that point to have it released," Wagat added.

Campus Security has taken a number of initiatives in recent months to increase safety on campus, including the introduction of off-campus security boards and a security listserv.

Recently, security has decided to totally dedicate one of its patrols to exterior checks. While patrols are normally assigned to check interior and exterior areas of campus, and to perform assigned checks, their purpose will now be to walk around campus looking for suspicious people, Wagat explained.

Campus Security continues to promote caution when walking alone and the use of Queen's safety resources, such as Walkhome or Campus Security Escorts.

Anyone with information is asked to contact Campus Security at 545-6733 or the Kingston Police at 549-4660.

PROFILE

By STEPHANIE CARVIN

Facing the prospect of not being able to return to Queen's next term because of financial difficulties, second-year engineering student Chris Chmelyk accompanied three AMS representatives on a trip to Queen's Park Wednesday.

AMS President Tom Stanley, Academic Affairs Commissioner Milan Konopek and Deputy Academic Affairs Commissioner Aaron Lazarus made the trip to Toronto to meet with members of the Ontario legislature.

Chmelyk has not yet been able to pay the full balance of his $4,600 tuition fee. His rent, utilities and food total approximately $350 per month. "I will [only] be able to get through to December," he said.

Last year Chmelyk finished the year $1,000 in debt to his brother. "I found a job in Toronto working for minimum wage this summer," he said. "I used that money to pay back my brother and for transportation to work. I finished the summer with savings of about $1,500."

Chmelyk, who has actively sought forms of public financial assistance, was rejected on the grounds that his parents' combined income was too high for him to qualify. "I have got to be entirely independent from my parents for a year for [OSAP] to give me any money," he said.

Chmelyk's parents are currently facing a large debt themselves and cannot afford to send him any more money. "My parents can only afford to send me $200 per month to help cover living expenses."

Turning to the banks for help, Chmelyk received $3,500 from the Toronto Dominion Bank. However, Chmelyk said this will not cover all of his expenses. An application to have his credit line expanded was rejected on the grounds that his parent's debt is too high, he added.

Chmelyk's last hope is a bursary from Queen's. "I'm counting on Queen's for a bursary," he said. However, Chmelyk will not hear back from the university until the end of January. "For me that is too late," he said.

Chmelyk wrote an open letter to Ontario Education Minister David Johnson stating that he wants an education in order to be a productive member of society.

David Caplan, the youth issues critic for the Liberal party, questioned Johnson on behalf of the AMS and Chmelyk during question period on Wednesday.

In his reply, the minister did not directly address Chmelyk's situation or the students sitting in the House.

Stanley stated in a press release that while Caplan asked the question, John Baird a conservative MPP from the Nepean riding held up a sign that read, "Mom, send money."

After question period ended, Johnson avoided the students and left the House through a back exit. Stanley said he was disappointed with Johnson's actions. "He should have answered the question in Question Period," Stanley remarked.

Chmelyk said he was happy the AMS was taking an active role in lobbying the government. "It's good that the AMS is involved and active and getting some attention brought to the issues," he said.

Team unable to reach goals

In a press release, Ogle stated, "After hearing the particulars of the case, it was my determination that Mr. Teske had failed to meet the onus of demonstrating 'clear and compelling evidence that the employee had been treated unjustly' as required by the above policy."

Minns said the AMS has not yet decided whether they will hire a new editor.

"I really wasn't expecting to get my job back. The policy was pretty cut and dry on that," said Teske. "My biggest concern was that I was being singled out and the policy wasn't being applied across the board."

Ogle's decision was finalized on Tuesday but was not made public until Wednesday evening.

"Technically the ruling should have been made by Friday," Ogle said, however, "there were a few delays."

Ogle had to seek advice from legal counsel before rendering a final decision and had to prepare a formal write-up.

There was also a delay in notifying Teske of the decision as Teske's address was listed incorrectly in the Who's Where, Ogle said.

"Obviously I'm disappointed," said Mike Beltzner, WW/WN information and operations manager. "I was honestly hoping that some leniency would be given to Jason because of how much work he has done."

Beltzner said that, without

Teske, the WW/WN staff will be unable to complete another goal this year, to provide graphic design services for the AMS, campus groups and undergraduate students. "It's looking like I'm not going to be able to do that," he said.

"It won't be possible with just two people there," Teske said.

Teske said the remaining managers, Beltzner and Rebecca Peatce (advertising and accounts), will now be mainly occupied with invoices for the publications. "I'm going to be helping them out," Teske said.

"I'm definitely receiving part of my salary," Teske said, however, at this time he is not certain how much.

Slain doctors

ALTHOUGH REMEMBRANCE DAY is a time to remember the brave who fell in war, it is also becoming associated with the cowardly acts of snipers who are taking aim at abortion doctors. The shooting of Barnett Slepian, the doctor who was slain in Buffalo, New York last week, was only the latest in a series of attacks on or around November 11 which began in 1994.

These acts of terror seem to be perpetrated for only one reason: to scare doctors away from providing an essential service for women. Doctors are being forced to choose between abandoning their commitment to patients and living in fear for their safety. Unless these violent attacks are stopped, the choice to have an abortion will be taken out of the hands of women and be dictated by a few fanatical snipers.

Three previous "Remembrance Day" shootings in Canada, none of which were fatal, were clearly harbingers of last week's violent murder. Despite a warning to doctors and police that was sent just hours before the attack, police did not take any action to protect the safety of Dr. Slepian. If similar tragedies are to be prevented, government and police need to make the security of abortion doctors a top priority.

While these sniper attacks are despicable and cowardly in nature, they are only a natural extension of the campaign of violence that has been waged against abortion clinics and providers in the U.S. and Canada. All acts of violence, including the bombing of clinics and attacks on clinic workers, are partially responsible for inciting this killing. As Dr. Slepian warned in 1994, "Please don't feign surprise... and certainly not innocence when a more volatile and less restrained member of the group decides to react... by shooting an abortion provider".

Paying more for less

CONTRARY TO WHAT CARL KEANE believes, the overcrowding in his department's seminars is probably not due to a sudden realization by students that the analytical skills learned in sociology courses are indispensable to their future. Rather, as the department heads of English and history admit, a lack of funding and resources is to blame for the overcrowding. With professors leaving and not being replaced, fewer sections are offered and students must be crammed into a smaller number of seminars. As a result, the most important part of seminars — the chance for students to actively participate and learn from each other — is being lost. Not only do many students feel unable to rise above the din and be heard in such large classes, they also fear that they will suffer from an unfair evaluation that puts a heavy emphasis on participation. This participation component, which is often weighted at 20 or even 30 per cent, is becoming less realistic in light of this overcrowding. It would be a shame to do poorly because you failed to get a good seat in class.

Since there doesn't seem to be much penny-pinched departments can do to improve this situation, the administration must answer for this decline in the quality of education.

Despite the across-the-board increases in tuition fees during the last two years, it appears that students at Queen's are getting less of an education. Already gouged by high tuition, surely students have the right to expect that if tuition goes up, the quality of education will at the very least stay the same.

Right, not wrong

MY NAME IS KEITH GEREN AND I am supporter of right-wing economic and political policies. It's been approximately 16 months since my last vote for the Reform Party.

While the above statement might sound like the words of a repentant sinner or substance abuser admitting his trespasses, I'm simply stating a fact. But I do so with some trepidation, because in the Queen's environment, declaring a preference for right-wing policies is akin to committing hara-kiri on your own public image.

I'm tired of the looks of contempt I receive for speaking my mind.

That's because there are too many people at this university who seem to view right-wing politics in an overly-normative light. To these misguided individuals, an expression of conservatism is taken as an overt personal attack. Words like "cutbacks," "fiscal restraint" and "tax breaks" are equated with the utterances of the Antichrist.

I'm tired of the looks of contempt I receive for speaking my mind on certain issues. I find it distressing when people try to debunk other's political views by attaching them to every negative "ism" that politically correct society has deemed to be in need of stilling. I don't begrudge people for being passionate defenders of their beliefs, but something is wrong when we decide to turn economic and political issues into moral ones. So, in order to prevent this from happening in the future, I'd like to dispel a few myths.

Let me assure everyone that I am not the Antichrist. I'm not racist or homophobic. I'm not a religious extremist. I don't spend my time defending the nuclear family model of society. I don't have a wrinkled copy of Mein Kampf tucked under my mattress.

What I do believe in is a smaller, more efficient system of government, restraint in public spending, lower taxes for hard working Canadians, and an active society which doesn't look to public officials to solve all its problems.

You'll hear the same story from almost every other right-wing policy supporter in this country. In fact, believe it or not, right-wingers want the same thing left-wingers and centredwellers want: a safe, content and progressive society. The difference is simply in the journey, not the destination. That right-wing supporters try to follow a different path to the end goal is not reason enough to engage in character assassination.

So the next time you feel inclined to disparage a conservative, try talking to them instead. Strike up a debate and really listen to what they have to say. You might discover they are a caring human being after all.

OPINIONS

The end of the liberal arts

BY ANDREW SMITH

SOME of history's greatest thinkers did their best learning outside a classroom setting. Many never went to university. Others attended university but seemed to gain little from it except some added facilities for self-education.

Thomas Jefferson was a largely self-educated man; his most recent biographer portrays his time at the College of William and Mary as spent playing cards and doing private reading. The colleges at Oxford and Cambridge in the last century have been described as merely "good rowing clubs," yet Britain was not left with a shortage of great intellectuals in the Victorian era.

John Stuart Mill was one of them, and he learned his Greek at the age of three, rather before university age. John Locke was trained as a medical doctor at Oxford, yet is remembered for his political theory and not his cures. His political education was at the side of a patient, the Earl of Shaftesbury, whose basic political ideas he imbibed and transmitted to the world.

The number of great contributors to the humanities who were unaided by university, either because they didn't go or because the universities of their time were useless, is testimony to the fact that universities are unnecessary.

But it's one thing to demonstrate that universities are superfluous, another to demonstrate that they are harmful. Over-specialization is encouraged by our universities. Specialization is clearly necessary in a division of labour economy, especially in light of the vast increase in the production of knowledge over the past few centuries.

The number of motivated students in self-directed university programs would outweigh those who now study liberal arts for a lack of something better to do.

That said, tremendous creative synergies occur when different fields meet in the mind of a single individual. Look at the contributions of Malthus to the fields of economics, biology, and demography. Richard Dawkins gave sociology a new twist when he applied economic concepts to reproductive strategies.

Specialization involves focusing on excellence in only a few fields. But do these fields all have to be humanities?

A few decades ago, C.P. Snow was concerned about specialization increasing the distance between the sciences and humanities. In an attempt to address his concern over the emergence of "two cultures," many schools now allow medials between "totally unrelated" [sic] subjects. And while some university programs do more to encourage breadth of knowledge than others, there seems to be something intrinsic in universities, in their departmental structure and the way scholarship is done that inhibits interdisciplinary linkages. The fact that there are special courses proudly called "interdisciplinary" is telling.

A few decades ago Preston Manning devised a new way of looking at the linkages between disciplines. He made a square chart with the names of disciplines arranged alphabetically on each side. In the square where, say, the "Anatomy" column crossed the "Politics" row he assigned a number indicating the amount of interdisciplinary contact there had been. The idea was to generate many subject combinations in the hope that some would prove intellectually fruitful.

If we were to compare the values on Preston Manning's 1960s chart with ones we might assign today, I'm sad to say that there probably would only be a few differences. Universities have functions aside from producing intellectuals. There are professional programs and many people with science degrees proceed to work in the more practical aspects of their field, such as doing drug testing for pharmaceutical companies. These programs should be retained. Moreover, there is an important socialization function that is part of the university experience for people in all fields.

Admittedly, it is difficult to see how this will be retained under the more individualistic system I am proposing. Scholarship has always been subsidized by the state, whether through the tithes that supported Malthus or the provincial grants that support Queen's. This tradition should be continued through a system of direct grants to students providing minimum sustenance during their independent studies. Students would be required to show lists of completed readings or otherwise prove that their studies are progressing. The government would also increase support for libraries, archives, and forums where the fruits of scholarship could be shared. Assuming that the number of students remains constant, this system would cost about the same as the present one.

I know this is an enormous assumption, but I think the number of "I always wanted to take the time to study Byzantium in depth and now I can" people would be more than balanced out by the number of people who presently study the humanities for lack of something better to do.

Liberal arts university programs are superfluous and medieval; let us consign them to the dustbin of history.

Pride and fear

Dear Editors,

It was with both pride and fear that we read Tara Mansbridge's letter in the October 27 Journal. Pride, because we, too, have had enough of feeling scared and vulnerable just because we are women; because we, too, feel that we should be able to have our freedom curtailed by the concerns of those who care for us. Ms. Mansbridge's courage instills pride in those of us who crave freedom from our fear.

But Ms. Mansbridge's letter also inspired fear because, as members of Campus Security and the Human Rights Office, we deal with those who have been assaulted. We see the deep and long-lasting trauma caused by these assaults; we see their fear intensify; the ability to trust diminish; and the constraints on behaviour, fuelled now by sad and terrifying experience, increase.

It is true that we are most likely to be assaulted by someone we know. However, if we choose to break the bonds of fear and walk alone at night, we ask that women not forget the other reality. Although relatively few in number, there are real assailants out there, as recent campus notices suggest. Therefore, we need to take precautions, just as we use caution walking through a construction site. If you choose not to use Walkhome or Security escorts, empower yourself by noting which houses or businesses have lights on as you walk and become familiar with the location of the emergency phones on campus. Stay alert, walk with confidence, and have a plan of action should you feel threatened or notice that someone is following you.

It angers and saddens us to remind women of these precautions, and to take them ourselves, just because we are women. We deserve to live without these constraints and look forward to the day when Ms. Mansbridge, and all women, will have no fear to swallow and will no longer tremble with the simple act of walking home at night.

Where's the tolerance?

Dear Editors,

I have read several recent issues with mounting concern. An erosion of human freedom appears to be making a pattern in recent articles and letters.

People are shocked by the use of a secret vote in the AMS Assembly. The secret vote is one of the building blocks of democracy. We should be proud that we are able to make use of this technique for granting freedom of thought to our representatives.

People are shocked by word choice (odd in a community where people use vulgar words with such a frequency that it becomes boring). One person is shocked by "tit," another by "breast," and others by words dealing with heterosexuality, homosexuality, and student government. We have freedom of speech here. One has the right to use whatever words one chooses; they can be criticized on the ground of effectiveness in communication, or artistic beauty, or even appropriateness to one's audience. But to be shocked is to imply that the other does not have the right to use these words. We all have the right to use whatever words we like.

People are shocked by a young woman's choice to walk alone in the dark. When I came to Queen's, I used the Walkhome service until my increasing familiarity with Kingston gave me the knowledge needed for relative safety. We have the right to make that choice, just as others have the right to choose to live in the safest way they can. The shock and anger of others is an attempt to limit our right to limit of movement.

People are shocked that a "rich kid" would write about student debt. Are they shocked when a poor kid writes an opinion about economics? No person should be denied the right to opinion based on how much money he has.

Let's be shocked about murder and rape; let's be shocked by the abrogation of human freedom whenever we find it; let's be shocked by the erosion of the rights we enjoy as Canadians. But let's not waste our emotive power on being shocked by the causal assumption of those rights. Let's applaud that assumption. This is a free country, thank God.

Once a Liberal...

Dear Editors,

Mr. Hughes's most recent foray into political debate ("Where's the Integrity," October 27) proves that he is in over his head again. Framed by a poor definition of integrity and a marked inability to distinguish between conservatives, liberals, and Liberals, his article serves a self-congratulatory whine that fails to grasp the complexity of the issues cited.

Furthermore, his decision to remain staunchly supportive of the very political party whose recent actions he despises demonstrates a complete lack of personal integrity. Mr. Hughes should be given a free Liberal membership for his continued blind obedience to the great big, heartless, headless machine that is the Liberal government.

Roll out the red carpet

Dear Editors,

I cannot help but take the bait of responding to an article that wonders where the integrity went from the Liberal Party of Canada. When surveying the recent past of federal politics, one is more likely to stumble upon a Tory MP than Liberal integrity.

A number of systemic and historical factors have made the Liberals the party of the 20th Century. The problem is, the Liberals know this.

Mr. Hughes falls into an unfortunate trap of describing all the actions he opposes in the federal government as "socially conservative." I was not aware that failing to compensate victims of government negligence was a conservative value. Indeed, conservative parties across Canada have supported a broad compensation package for Hepatitis C victims, while an intransigent Liberal government has resolutely refused to do the right thing. Their actions are not conservative; they are arrogant and narrow-minded. If Mr. Hughes is pining for the ghosts of Liberals past, he would do well to note the dominance of these two skeletons in the party's closet.

Mr. Hughes's rant on the pay equity ruling is absurd. He presupposes that the Tribunal at hand was correct in assessing the legitimacy of the complaint. The question is not the simple notion of "equal treatment" as Mr. Hughes would have us believe. The issue centres around the nebulous and arbitrary notion of equal pay for work of equal value. What constitutes work of equal value? Good question. Cross comparisons were done of various job types while market forces and other considerations were ignored.

Concerns over methodology aside, Mr. Hughes's contention that the payments "should not be questioned" is offensive and undemocratic. While I do not disagree with Mr. Hughes's profound statement that "human beings are human beings," I disagree with the idea that civil servants were treated unfairly to the tune of $6 billion.

As far as the APEC scandal, paraphrasing Pierre Trudeau when discussing the suspension and abuse of civil liberties, without irony, is inadvertently hilarious. Last time I checked, the utilization of the War Measures Act does not constitute an example of the gentle hand of traditional Liberal benevolence. Yes, the handling of the APEC protests was a heinous violation of fundamental human rights, and yes it's happened before on the Liberal watch.

Reg Whitaker has described the Liberals as Canada's Natural Governing Party. This is not because of the inherent justice of the Liberal Party. It is a recognition that a number of systemic and historical factors have made the Liberals the party of the 20th Century. The problem is, the Liberals know this.

And it is here that Mr. Hughes misses the point. The main problem with Liberal governments is not necessarily their policies (wacky as they may be). The problem is that the arrogance that comes along with the belief that you have a right to form the government leads to irresponsible, self-satisfied and unresponsive government.

Mr. Hughes may disagree with current Liberal policies, but he lives up to the party's tendency to believe that they have the monopoly on the national interest.

Inflexible entry standards discriminate

Dear Editors,

I would like to comment on a statement attributed to me which appeared in the Friday, October 23 Journal. The statement suggested that "if 90 per cent of Aboriginal people don't finish secondary education in one span ... their access to higher education is hindered."

What I actually explained was that for some groups in Canadian society, discrimination comes in the form of systemic barriers which limits their access to higher education. We know that aboriginal communities have worked for a long time to fit into an education system which was never designed to meet their specific social and cultural needs.

The lack of response from the Canadian education system has resulted in overall lower rates of participation and graduation from high schools that form the traditional pool of university students. The end result is that aboriginal students who interrupt their high school education for social, cultural, or financial reasons, or who an alternate type of education find the inflexible entry requirements to university a barrier.

My point in making this statement is that the human rights work that needs to be done with respect to aboriginal communities should focus on the systemic barriers that prevent potential aboriginal students from even entering the system. This is the type of issue that the Aboriginal Council at Queen's tries to address.

Chez Piggy falls short on reputation

Dear Editors,

As I read the "Piggy delights" article (October 20) I realized that this was not written with the intent of criticism. However, I cannot restrain myself from commenting on this interesting yet misleading article.

I too have dined at Chez Piggy, along with numerous other "fine" Kingston restaurants, but unlike Aaron, my view of the restaurant is somewhat different. My first impression of Chez Piggy was one of disappointment as I was greeted by a casual dining style atmosphere and menu prices that were comparable to Toronto restaurants, although seemingly more hard to justify. The service was satisfactory, and the food was rather bland and unimpressive for all of the raving reviews that the restaurant seems to get.

There is nothing extraordinary about Chez Piggy that warrants the accolades and praise it seems to receive, except for its highly over-rated service, food, and ambiance.

A helpful slap in the face?

Dear Editors,

[In response to the article "Tell me I suck," October 14] I'll be the first to tell you: Ken, you suck. From an "enemy" who wants to help you improve yourself, I will begin by criticizing the lack of forethought in your article.

I agree that for self-improvement to occur you need an honest opinion about where your faults lie but it's ridiculous to suggest changing your voice (not to mention refraining from wearing your favourite hat) to become a better person.

In the realm of social issues, are these things really worth bothering about? Do you really want to change on behalf of your enemies? Should the people you slandered in your article undergo massive personality reconstructions in order to become "better" people to you?

There is a place for honest criticism: when it's constructive and asked for. If you are anxious to know why your curements don't like you, ask them. I'm sure they will be very happy to oblige.

Newspapers need diversity

Dear Editors,

I agree with Mr. Schuster on one important issue: Michael Taube should not have been "indefinitely suspended," at least not for having stirred up a little controversy. True, political diversity among columnists makes for a good newspaper. I also concede that the quality of The Toronto Star's writing often leaves something to be desired.

I think, however, that Mr. Schuster has allowed his personal connection with Mr. Taube and a decidedly right-wing political stance to run roughshod over his sense of perspective.

Pick up a Toronto Star sometime and hold it up to the looking glass. What do you see? That's right, The Globe and Mail. Though flashier and presentation and admittedly possessed of greater literary talents, it is to the left what The Toronto Star is to the right. To its credit it will on occasion print an article of leftist persuasion, but there is certainly no counterpart to a Michael Taube on staff.

Though the Travel section may bore you, Mr. Schuster, there are those among us that actually prefer to see a bit of the world rather than fuel our financial obsessions with a reading of the Report on Business. Just imagine, people with interests other than yours.

Both papers have their flaws. Given my druthers I would restate Mr. Taube with The Toronto Star, and have The Globe hire its political polar opposite.

David McFarlane of The Globe and Mail's "Cheap Seats" recently pointed out that the use of a regular column to respond to a reader's letter is a gross abuse of power. He even called this idea the first lesson of journalistic integrity. In light of this, Mr. Taube's suspension is justified, but Dalton Camp and Michele Landsberg should be along for the ride. This certainly pokes some holes in The Star's dedication to diversity. The Globe, however, has yet to hire Mr. Taube's alter-ego. Both papers could use some attitude adjustment.

All in all, Mr. Schuster's attack on The Star's integrity has merit, but remains hopelessly one-sided. Judging by the title of his article, Mr. Schuster might have been in a bit of a flap at the time of his writing. Remember the wisdom of Bruce Lee: "Emotion clouds the mind." By the way, it's called National Post. The rest of us have known for about a month.

Can the pop, already

Dear Editors,

I would like to ask that we put the cola issue to rest. However, considering that the debate is such a "hotbed" of publishable news, a more reasonable request might be that we limit arguments to the subject at hand rather than to the evils of cola companies and their marketing strategies.

We don't like it that Queen's may sign a contract limiting our choice of soft drinks on campus and we resent the power that big corporations have over cash-strapped institutions like universities. However, this is the real world where people and institutions need money to survive. Queen's needs the cash, and the cola companies want to advertise. That's the issue in a nutshell.

Let's cut the crap folks — this is not a big deal. The world is not going to end and our lives are not going to noticeably change. In an article entitled "The physiology of a cola deal," Michael Johnson ignored the depth to which Cola companies stoop to sell their product and omitted the fact that this deal more or less decides what drinks we can consume while on campus.

Instead, he focused (erroneously) on the role of cola companies as pushers, and decided to argue this point by demonstrating that individual components of cola may be harmful when taken in mass quantities (despite the fact that everything, including water, can be harmful when taken in mass quantities).

I challenge anyone to find a scientific journal showing that refined sugar "causes" mild depression, psychosis, or pimples. I applaud Mr. Johnson's efforts in finding new ways to beat this issue into the ground, but I'd like to suggest that we lavish our attention on more important issues such as solving racism, ending war, eliminating poverty, and protecting the future of our children.

Argument lacks research

Dear Editors,

Adam Kaminsky's article, "Start cutting schools", paints an overly simplistic picture of the university system in Ontario and proscribes an even more simplistic way to improve it.

I would like to ask Mr. Kaminsky how many students at these universities he knows well enough to make such a generalization? How familiar is he with their programs? Has he ever attended or visited all these universities? These are all questions that surely must be answered before anyone can draw the egregious conclusions that he does.

Furthermore, how does one determine who "deserves" to go to university? What is the criteria for a "backwards" school? How is it that eliminating some schools will automatically result in an increase in the value of the education at other schools?

Kaminsky answers none of these questions instead he continues his barrage of unreasoned, unsubstantiated arguments which amount to nothing more than a series of sophomoric generalizations. His over-simplification of a very complex issue is indicative of intellectual malaise itself. If Kaminsky's new world order ever does become reality any time soon he had better start packing his bags.

Provincial government doesn't deserve credit

Dear Editors,

In regards to the on-going tuition debate, I think that a fundamental problem with the arguments needs to be addressed. I would like to know where people are getting the idea that governments are short of money from.

The Ontario government, whose contributions to post-secondary education are the lowest in Canada and lower than 49 of 50 U.S. States (per capita), began their term in office with a 30 per cent cut in income taxes. The federal government just posted a $3 billion surplus.

Could someone please tell me where the problem is? Where is the funding shortage? Before we start debating the benefits of differing loan programs and where students are coming from we should address the need for tuition increases in the first place.

The only justification for tuition increases that I have seen from anyone is that governments are broke. I say it's simply a matter of priority. Mr. Harris wanted to provide the rich people of Ontario with a tax break (those with average incomes receive very little break — a few hundred dollars at most) and did so at our expense.

I have relatives in Latvia, which has existed as an independent nation since 1991. The Latvian people have major issues to deal with that don't even come close to what is happening in Canada. Yet my cousin who is attending university in Latvia has her tuition paid by the government and receives a small stipend to cover for expenses at university. The Latvians have decided that education is a matter of national priority, something that I think we should do in Canada.

Before we debate the benefits of differing loan programs we should address the need for tuition increases in the first place.

Mr. Jones, et al., could you please tell me how our government can remotely justify their priorities? "Government overspending" is a popular bandwagon, but there doesn't seem to be any truth to it from my standpoint.

Why I voted 'no' III

Dear Editors,

I would like to take this opportunity to respond to Ms. Suri's article and present a concise and accurate explanation of why I voted 'no' to the motion presented by the AMS executive, to essentially join OUSA.

When some members voted 'no' to the motion, they did not vote against the principle of letting students decide. I certainly did not vote against the merits of presenting it to the students; rather I voted 'no' to the wording of the question to be placed on referendum.

I felt that it was in the best interests of all students to be presented an unbiased question that was not limited in scope. Suggested questions were: "Do you want to join a provincial lobbying organization"; "Do you want to join OUSA"; "Do you want to join CFS-O."

Surely had the AMS executive agreed to this amendment at Assembly that night, I would have agreed to it being placed on the referendum.

Furthermore, I want to express my dissatisfaction with The Journal editorial which asserted that those Assembly members who voted 'no' did so because they thought Queen's students were "not intelligent enough." Recent letters have claimed that we said students "would not be able to grasp the issue of alignment" that the "average student couldn't possibly be trusted to make the decision," or that "students do not have the brain capacity to store all the information required."

These claims lack validity. I did not vote 'no' because of these reasons and I did not imply these reasons.

In fact, I did feel it was best to represent those students who were not informed — not because they are not intelligent, but rather because the average student may not have been given the proper opportunity to learn what OUSA is, that there is another provincial lobbying organization (CFS-O), and what the differences are between the two.

That is why I voted 'no' — to express these concerns and to remind that both organizations should (and I hope will) be properly presented in the campaign period. Similarly, on the referendum, students should be able to decide whether or not they are in favour of alignment, and subsequently which organization they would like to align with.

I certainly do not think students are "unintelligent." I strongly believe students should determine the final result and that they are perfectly capable of doing so.

Ms. Suri has every right to express her dissatisfaction; ultimately we are responsible to the students. However, some Assembly members felt it was more democratic to place a non-biased question on the referendum — one that is not limited in its scope, and one that ultimately gives students the choice they deserve: between OUSA and CFS-O.

Vampires and viruses

VAMPIRES ARE mythical beings... right? They're the creation of turn-of-the-century novelists and Hollywood screenwriters, a useful literary tool to explore the link between sexuality and violence. In a pinch, a vampire makes for a pretty decent, if unoriginal, Hallowe'en costume. But nothing more. Right?

That may be true now, but in the early 18th century in Eastern Europe vampires were a real concern and a hot topic of conversation. Scientists today are searching for an explanation for those original vampires, for the facts beyond the myth. In this quest for truth, the first place many researchers have turned is the history books.

IN RURAL SERBIA IN THE 1730s a string of murders and farm animal deaths were attributed to vampires, which had first been described in 1693. Around that time, a number of exhumed corpses were found to be in remarkably good condition, their veins still holding liquid blood. Over the years, the story was augmented with each retelling and, eventually, those corpses were said to come alive and rise from their graves to attack people and animals, drinking the blood of their victims.

Soon, a very detailed portrait of vampires emerged. They were generally males who could appear either as a human or in animal form: a wolf, a dog, a cat, a bat, but never a cow, or a sheep, or a pig. They had become vampires, most commonly, after an attack by another vampire, or sometimes by eating the meat from an animal killed by a vampire or by being sexually promiscuous. You could protect yourself from vampires by rubbing yourself with garlic or by brandishing a mirror. Vampires only lived for 40 days, but that was still plenty of time for them to kill your dog, rape your daughters and beat up your livestock.

Scientists today are searching for an explanation for the original vampires, for the facts beyond the myth.

Those 1730s Serbian villagers, doubtlessly having heard all these vampire stories, did the only thing they could do: they started digging up bodies, finding many of them rosy-cheeked with blood trickling from their mouths and fully erect genitalia. They drove stakes into those stiffs and were quite horrified when the dead bodies cried out in pain. The peasants then cut the heads off the bodies and burned the whole bloody mess to ashes. This ritual was played out, not just once or twice, but hundreds of times, on a weekly basis in some places.

TODAY, NOW THAT VAMPIRES are bound to the realm of movies and comic books, some scientists are trying to explain the vampire phenomenon, to diagnose vampirism from the "symptoms" described in folklore.

A recent explanation, one that has won much popular appeal, proposes that vampires were sufferers of a rare form of a genetic disease called porphyria, a disorder affecting the synthesis of hemoglobin. The form of this disease associated with vampirism is congenital erythropoietic porphyria. Its symptoms include protruding teeth and sensitivity of the skin to sunlight, resulting in blisters and scarring. It has been suggested that "vampires" would suck their victim's blood in an instinctive need for the enzymes missing from their own.

There are problems with this theory, however, as pointed out in a 1995 editorial in the Postgraduate Medical Journal by Ann Cox, then of McGill University. She points out that congenital erythropoietic porphyria is so exceptionally rare, only 200 cases have ever been diagnosed, that it couldn't possibly account for the huge number of suspected vampires in the Balkans in the 1700s. As well, enzymes from ingested blood cannot incorporate themselves, intact and functional, into one's blood stream, so sucking blood wouldn't alleviate symptoms of porphyria. Furthermore, vampires' sensitivity to light and inability to emerge in the daytime are very recent additions to the myths, more recent even than Bram Stoker's 1897 work Dracula — his vampire had no such problems. And since the blisters associated with porphyria leave the skin scarred and disfigured, the corpses would not be left in the life-like condition of the suspected vampire bodies unearthed in the 1700s. Also, porphyria doesn't even begin to explain any of the other aspects of vampirism — the transmission of the condition through a bite, the association with animals, garlic, mirrors, or post-mortem liquid blood. Clearly, another explanation is needed.

A MUCH MORE ROBUST hypothesis for the origin of the vampire myth appears in September's edition of the scientific journal Neurology. Juan Gómez-Alonso, a Spanish neurologist, argues that most of the folklore surrounding vampires, from their physical characteristics to their behaviour to their well-preserved corpses, is strikingly similar to a much less supernatural phenomenon: rabies.

Rabies is a viral disease which infects the central nervous system, causing fever, anxiety and disturbed sleep in its initial stages. In furious rabies, the most common form in humans, later symptoms include wandering, increased sensitivity to stimuli, inability to swallow, muscle spasms, coma and death, usually by suffocation on one's own bodily fluids and most often within two months of infection. The similarities between vampirism and rabies start, appropriately enough, with death and those immaculate bodies dug up in 1693.

Sudden death, such as by suffocation, allows the blood to stay liquid in a dead body for a much longer period of time than usual and the penis can remain turgid even after death in such a case (remember Clerks?). The coldness and dampness of the ground in which those bodies were buried could explain how those bodies remained healthy-looking for so long. Further, as a body decomposes, gases are formed and build up within the corpse. This can cause a bloody froth to appear around the mouth and, if the body is pierced at this time, the gas can escape with a noise something like a scream.

With the rabies theory, the association of animals with vampires is now easy to explain. Humans most often contract rabies from an animal bite and an 18th century Serbian peasant seeing both a man wandering around at night, foaming at the mouth, and a rabid dog in the same condition might well conclude that the two were the same creature in different forms. The select group of animals that were associated with vampires can also be explained with this theory, because farm animals usually develop the paralytic form of rabies, which has a completely different set of symptoms from furious rabies. The rabies virus is usually passed from host to host through a bite, just as vampirism was supposed to have been, although the rabies virus can also pass through the mucous membranes, so sexual transmission and contraction through infected food are possible. Even the garlic and mirrors of vampire folklore make some sense. A person in the advanced stages of rabies becomes hypersensitive to many kinds of stimuli. For example, a rabid dog becomes very agitated at the sight of the ripples and reflection in water, hence the other name for rabies, hydrophobia. The strong smell of garlic or the sight of a reflection in a mirror would send a rabid person into convulsions. These contractions would mainly involve the muscles of the face and throat, causing growling and a grotesque toothy grin.

And finally, there are historical records of an epidemic of rabies among dogs and wolves in Hungary in the early 1700s. The timing, location and widespread nature of the outbreak coincide with the beginning of the legend of the vampire.

With vaccines and treatments now readily available, it would be unlikely today for a person to ever reach the advanced stages of rabies as described here. Unlikely, but not impossible.

John Bowman has never drunk human blood. Honest.

Spirits from the Otherworld have haunted Kingston for centuries. Quaint, sweet community, or big, scary...

Ghost town?

BY LIZ "THE LIZARD" FROGLEY

OCTOBER 31 IS CREEPING UP ON US, and with it will come great unrest in the Otherworld, tempting all of Kingston's ghostly spirits and ghouls out to play.

Shhhh... listen:

The Scottish once believed that at the end of each quarter year the souls of the dead became disturbed, but on All Hallows Eve they became more than a little upset — there was total upheaval and all of the dead were released to shed horror and destruction. Fairies stole children, ghost horses scared riders off the road and witches met in graveyards to wreak havoc on all. Great bonfires were lit at dusk to keep the evil spirits at bay. Queen's no longer keeps spirits away with bonfires, but ghosts still haunt the night. And on Hallowe'en, when the inhabitants of the Otherworld descend on our fair campus, it's best to know who's coming for dinner.

Fortunately for all of us, most of the ghosts around Queen's are harmless.

demned. They say even in death he is tormented by guilt, and damned to roam the halls of his old home.

ON THE TOP FLOOR of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre — before it was torn apart for the current renovations — stood a room with a piano. The room was kept almost exactly as it appeared when the building was a house, and many believe at least one of the house's occupants remain. Before renovations began, you might have heard the piano playing, and if you had gone upstairs to the piano room, you might have seen the keys moving when there wasn't another living soul around. One of the centre's employees has even seen a woman there, walking beside her... maybe Agnes Etherington herself.

And who knows? Perhaps when renovations are complete, the ghost of Agnes will return for the sequel: Agnes: The Art of Blood!

Horror show #1: Alfie Pierce

Alfie Pierce (famed of Alfie's Pub) haunted a janitor at the Student Union Building, telling him that great wealth was buried beneath a limestone wall in Kingston. The janitor nearly went mad in his quest for it...

IT USED TO BE SAID that after his death in 1951 Alfie Pierce haunted the Student Union Building. Some people will say that Alfie was an athletic trainer beloved by all, and some will tell you he was horribly mistreated during his tenure at this school. What nearly everyone agrees on is that he spent his life at Queen's, and seems intent on spending eternity here.

Almost immediately after his death, Alfie began to appear before one of the janitors who had known him. The man claimed that Alfie said he'd hidden money beneath a limestone wall, but would only give the pattern of the wall, not the location. The janitor spent years searching for buried treasures and seeing Alfie every night, but with all the limestone at Queen's and Alfie unwilling to tell any more, he found nothing. Those who knew Alfie say this was the type of joke he'd play, for though the man knew Alfie didn't have money to hide away, he nearly went mad in his doomed quest for it.

ABOUT TEN YEARS after his death, Alfie started to appear more often. Late one evening a janitor working alone in the JDUC saw a man in strange clothing standing nearby. The stranger turned and smiled at him, then walked through the wall and was gone. When the building's staff began to arrive the next morning, they found the janitor railing at a portrait of Alfie, which then hung on the JDUC's second floor. The poor janitor had recognised the portrait as the man he'd seen that night, and berated Alfie for frightening him, demanding that it never happen again.

OF COURSE, it did happen again, though not to this same man. A woman working at the Alumni Review office, which was where the International Centre now stands, heard footsteps coming into her office, though no one was there. The steps proceeded across the room to the closet, when the door opened and slammed shut. After an investigation, Alfie's old uniform was discovered in the closet.

Not too long after all this, Alfie's uniform was relocated to the basement of Summerhill, and Alfie stopped appearing to the occupants of the JDUC. Though there have been ghosts rumoured in Summerhill, no one can say if it is Alfie or another restless spirit.

JUST NORTH of the JDUC on University Avenue stands the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society building, "The Core," which also has its own spirit. Though no one knows how he came to be there, he's often heard walking and banging about on the third floor, and once he was actually seen. A woman brought her son to the Core and while she talked downstairs the boy ran around the building — no one else was there, so he had to amuse himself. When it came time to leave, the boy told his mother about the little boy he'd met upstairs.

They knew there was no other child, but the boy was convinced and described his new playmate. Of course, there was no one else in the building at the time, but now they know their ghost a little better.

THE JOURNAL HOUSE too is haunted, but this is a spirit we know. Don Munro was Entertainment Editor at The Journal in 1986-87. He spent endless hours working on the paper and was well-liked by all the other editors. Then, during reading week, he died tragically in a skiing accident. The Journal office moved from the JDUC to its current home on Earl Street four years later and ever since people have been spooked by the sounds of footsteps and chairs being dragged on the second floor when there was no one in the house. One past editor saw filing cabinet drawers open on their own.

Though the ghost is friendly, few who've seen or heard him will work alone in the building.

BUT, YOU MAY WONDER, what about the student village-of-the-damned? Surely the old houses must have their share of ghosts. According to scholar Kingston Otherworld connoisseur and haunted-walk leader Glen Shackleton, many students have moved in to find evil spirits awaiting them. He's heard accounts of trails of blood appearing on the floor, strange footsteps and candles that launch themselves across a room.

It's time to fight back

Tomorrow, 1 p.m.: A rally at the market on King Street.
Your voice is needed to help raise awareness and speak out against the hate and pain being inflicted on members of the queer community.

By TARYN MCCORMICK

YOU MAY NOT KNOW, but there's a revolution going on right under our noses. In fact, there's probably more than one.

The one I'm talking about is being called "Stonewall 2." In case you don't know what or where Stonewall was, let me give you a little background.

In 1969, as a number of individuals came out of a New York City bar called Stonewall, police officers attempted to arrest them and dole out their customary brutal beatings and physical violations on members of the queer community. It is important to note that this type of physical violence was the norm at the time. Queers could expect that either they, or friends of theirs, would experience police brutality regularly.

At a rally in New York City that was sparked by the murder of Matthew Shepard, police intervened, beating protesters, using racist, homophobic slurs and arresting between 130 and 200 people. Protesters fought back — most witnesses say they won.

A hoard of protesters showed up at Matthew Shepard's funeral carrying signs saying things such as "God hates fags" and "Matt's in hell now."

In this episode, however, they fought back. Queers came from all over to fight back en masse and to say, "No, we will not put up with this anymore." The fighting lasted for about three days and from it, the gay liberation movement was born. This was the first recorded time that queers had organized in a big way to fight the injustices done to them.

WELL, IT'S BACK. Recently in Wyoming, a 21-year old gay man was lured out of a bar by two men, Russell Henderson and Aaron McKinney. Once outside, the three of them drove to the outskirts of town, tied him to a fence, at which point, according to The Globe and Mail, "they slashed him, burned him and bashed in his skull with a .357 magnum handgun," and left him to freeze. Two bicyclists found him 18 hours later.

His name was Matthew Shepard, he never regained consciousness and died five days later.

Adding insult to injury, a horde of protesters showed up at his funeral carrying signs saying things such as "God hates fags" and "Matt's in hell now." The queer supporters who flocked to the funeral formed a line between the homophobes and the funeral, sang "Amazing Grace" to drown out the protesters and attempted to block the hateful placards with umbrellas. Because the queer community has refused to ignore this hatred, queer positive vigils, rallies and protests have occurred all over the United States and Canada.

THE LARGEST OF THESE rallies was held on October 19 in New York City. Thousands showed up to voice their feelings at a political funeral. Organizers publicised the event through word of mouth and expected about 500 people to participate. At one point it is estimated that the crowd reached a total of 10,000. The group did not, however, have a parade permit to march down 5th Avenue to Madison Square Park.

The police responded to the gathering and came in ready to fight, armed in full riot gear, some riding motorcycles and others on horseback. In fact, police were called in from all five boroughs.

The first thing the police did was arrest the march negotiators and marshals (those participants who are in charge of guiding the march itself in the right direction, the ones who watch out for the safety of the marchers and the ones who know the marchers' rights).

As soon as other protesters stepped in to fill the role of marshal, they too were arrested and whisked away. The police even went after the legal observers, three were arrested and two were physically assaulted. In addition, these lawyers were not permitted to meet with protesters that had been arrested.

I challenge all of you reading this to do something, to say something!

The police then descended on the crowd. The police drove motorcycles onto the sidewalk where people were standing and trampled people by riding their horses into the crowd. They swung their nightsticks, harshly beating a number of individuals, threw around racist and homophobic slurs, and arrested somewhere between 130 and 200 individuals. Despite the threat of physical harm and legal punishment, the protesters fought back and battled the police in the streets for two hours, and, according to most witnesses, they won.

Those arrested were threatened, verbally harassed, physically brutalised, deprived of food and water, prohibited from making phone calls and not informed of the charges held against them. Some detainees even had necessary medication confiscated.

The group of people who were arrested at this event spanned three generations and all walks of life. Sylvia Rivera, a drag queen who was arrested at the Stonewall Rebellion, was also arrested at this protest and voiced the opinion that it was the rebirth of Stonewall. Who would have thought it would have to happen again?

I GUESS IT ALWAYS JUST SEEMED pretty obvious to me. No matter what your sex, gender identification, sexual orientation, race, colour, ability, religion; it was clear that all people are good people until proven otherwise and everyone deserves respect, understanding and a friendly attitude. Perhaps I was naive as it has been made abundantly clear to me that there are a lot of people in this world who believe the complete opposite.

Why was James Byrd recently lynched in Jasper, Texas?

Why did two men brutally beat, rob and kill Matthew Shepard?

Why are women brutally beaten and raped by people that they love?

Why can the government justify stepping on the poorest members of society?

The only answers I can come up with are ignorance and intolerance — both of which are unacceptable in this day and age.

Mainstream papers have lamented the fact that Matthew Shepard was killed but they are not covering this rebellion and nobody is talking about it. Why?

You can check public records to see if it's true, you can hear first hand accounts. Why is nothing being done? I challenge all of you reading this to do something, to say something!

A group of us have decided that this is too horrific to ignore and we want your help to fight back and to make our voices heard. There will be a rally at the market on King Street this Saturday at 1 p.m. to wake Kingston up to the prevalence of hate and the pain caused specifically by queer-bashing.

It just seems like the obvious thing to do.

AND DON'T THINK YOU'LL STAY SAFE by leaving the village of the damned on Hallowe'en night. All over Kingston, spirits are lurking — gathering beneath the site of the old gallows, or at the shore of the lake where bodies of the drowned drifted in... or in the basement of your favourite pub.

Horror show #6: The Journal

IN THE 1890s The Wellington was the home of a biscuit maker, and in the basement of the building you can still hear the brooding of the giant oven that used to bake the biscuits. One evening, the man's son was playing hide and seek with his friends in the basement, when he figured that the oven would make the perfect hiding place. He hid inside, but realised to his horror that he couldn't open the door from the inside. His playmates searched for him and his patents looked too, but the oven was sealed tight to keep the heat in, smothering his screams. The boy was not discovered until the next morning, when the cook opened the oven to bake the day's biscuits. Do not be surprised if you ever hear faint screams drifting upwards to the pub.

YOU MIGHT THINK TO AVOID such hauntings by going elsewhere, but there is scarcely an unhaunted corner in Kingston. The Toucan has had problems with an unruly ghost, and has had to block off a storage room and discontinue its use. There were too many pots being flung from the walls and too many accidents — they thought best to give the ghost its way.

could be found, hoping to have peace at last. The man dug up the basement in search of the grave but uncovered nothing, for when Theresa lived and was killed, the basements of the three shops were connected. Theresa only knew the old design of the basement, and could not tell where her body would be found. She still lies beneath the floor and haunts the shops, waiting for someone to uncover the truth.

SUZUKA SHOWDOWN
The Formula 1 driver's championship has come down to the final race of the season for a second straight year and Michael Schumacher is again at the heart of the event. With flying Finn Mika Hakkinen enjoying a four point lead going into the race at Suzuka, Japan, the German Uberdriver must win to claim his third driver's crown. After last year's embarrassing attempt to dethrone Jacques Villeneuve, hopefully Schumacher will try and win the race fairly this time. Both teams have spared no expense preparing for this showdown, they have spent a combined $83 million on race preparations and transportation for this event.

FLUTIE MANIA
The Doug Flutie bandwagon is beginning to overflow with new fans. The diminutive Buffalo quarterback has enjoyed great success since the injury of promising starter Rob Johnson. Flutie has led the Bills to three consecutive wins, including a dramatic comeback win against the vaunted Jacksonville Jaguars. With the AFC's second best quarterback rating, a 18 for 22 performance against the Carolina Panthers and the backing of just about every Bills fan, there is a quarterback controversy brewing. Enjoy Flutie's success while it lasts, it may be short-lived.

INITIATION GONE BAD
The University of Western Ontario football program was rocked by an off-field scandal when a rookie receiver was involved in an automobile hit and run with another student during initiation activities. The event, which continues to be shrouded in secrecy, have led to sanctions against the program. The most immediate is the suspension of Head Coach Larry Haylor for the final two games of the regular season. Other punishments include mandatory initiation seminars for football players, a suspension of athletic awards and an end to orientation practices within the football program.

IF CHRISTMAS CAME EARLY...
Other NHL teams that have redesigned their uniforms would follow the Islanders example and revert back to the original jerseys.
The Mets would get what they deserve for their free agent spending and finish in last place.
Schumacher would act like he is in a Formula 1 car and not a bumper car in the season's final race.

Volleyball set to kill

BY ALEX MUELLER-GASTELL

The early tournament record of the Queen's men's volleyball team indicates that this year's team will provide a welcome escape from the cold and icy Kingston winter.

"Everybody is feeding off of each other's work ethic and the competitiveness that exists in the daily practices."

— Coach Brenda Willis

The team is defined by a mixture of experience and talent, featuring a number of fourth-year players in key positions. They are complemented by younger players that have extensive and impressive resumes at the club and provincial level. Led by fifth-year co-captain Andrew Calder and third-year co-captain Andy Lynn, the starting lineup features mainly upper-year players such as Frederic Connoir and Greg Stevenson. The depth of the team is enhanced by a pool of young talented players such as Michel Cameron, who was a member of the Quebec team that won the 1997 Canada Games, and Scott Millington, who worked very hard over the summer to earn a starting job in the middle.

"Everybody is feeding off of each other's work ethic and the competitiveness that exists in the daily practices," said Head Coach Brenda Willis. With the talent and potential inherent in this squad, it is now Willis' job to iron out some of the finer points of the game. Willis feels that for the team to reach the next level, it has to become "more consistent, mentally tougher, and has to improve the team defence."

The team took steps in that direction last weekend by beating York en route to capturing the gold medal as the host of the Queen's Invitational. Although Willis admits that the strongest competition this year will again come from York and U of T, the match against the Yeomen should not be viewed as a reference point for the rest of the season. Still, the next few games will allow the team to better assess its position compared to the rest of the league, with games coming up at Toronto and Laurentian and then back home against Toronto.

All the right ingredients seem to be in place for a strong season, as long as the team maintains their consistent style of play.

One more chance

BY ADAM KAMINSKY

After a tumultuous trip through the O-QIFC regular season, the Queen's Golden Gaels have been left with a very simple route to the playoffs — win the final game of the season. When the Bishop's Gaitsers (3-4) visit Richardson Stadium on Hallowe'en, the Gaels (3-4) are going to have to dress-up as the team that went 3-1 to start the season, or it could be an abrupt end to a promising campaign.

With Ottawa and Concordia playing for first place and Laval's win over Queen's clinching them third, it will be a new chapter in an old rivalry that decides fourth spot. With that position in the standings will come the final invitation to the playoff party, an invitation that these two talented teams thought they would have already secured by this game.

Team	G	W	L	T	A	P
Ottawa	7	6	1	247	141	12
Concordia	7	5	2	299	221	10
Laval	8	4	4	181	158	8
Queen's	7	3	4	189	131	6

McGill	7	3	4	87	151	6
Carleton	7	1	6	89	237	2

Bishop's vs Queen's Saturday 1 p.m. Richardson Stadium, on West Campus

While the rise and fall of Queen's has been well documented, the Bishop's Gaitsers have endured similar peaks and valleys. After beginning the season with two wins, against Carleton and Queen's, the lads from Lennoxville enjoyed the third ranking in the CIAU. This lofty status was short-lived, and with two losses to Ottawa and losses to Laval and Concordia, the Gaitsers have put themselves in a precarious position.

As for the home team, while the heartbreaking loss at Laval in the final minute kept them from clinching a playoff spot, there were some positives to be taken from the game. "[The Laval] game was a tough loss, but I was encouraged that everyone played hard and we were in a position to win," said Head Coach Bob Howes.

The squad must now turn their attention to a Gaitsers team that they lost to in week

Soccer team on a roll

BY ROBERT MACNEIL

The women's soccer team has completed a perfect season and is rolling into the OUA championship tournament this weekend. With an 11-0-1 record, the Gaels are ranked number one in the country but have their sights set on a more important goal — a championship.

Dave McDowell has been coaching Queen's women's soccer for 10 years now and this is the first undefeated team that he has coached. Despite the number one ranking, "we are only worried about where we finish," said McDowell.

The coach attributes the team's success this year to a balanced consistency and to many players who have stepped their game up to a new level.

In goal for the Gaels this year has been the talented combination of second-year player Amanda Foran and rookie Laura Gibson. When discussing Foran, McDowell said that "she has done very well and is constantly improving."

One of the basic steps to building a quality championship team is goaltending, and this team is quite solid in that aspect of the game. Solidifying the defence this past season has been Raelen Dunne, who was described by her coach as "feisty and intelligent [and] a real benefit to the team." McDowell also had high praise for Nicole Miller who "has done a terrific job." The defence has only given up eight goals all year and McDowell admits that their opponents' offence "haven't done a lot against us."

The same cannot be said for the Gaels' offence, however. This team's forwards have tremendous speed, especially with Kim Mwenifumbo and Ange Crockford. McDowell describes both players as "loaded with speed, [and they have] scored tons of goals."

With this Gael team, there is not much of a focus placed on individual players. Instead, an overall team-first concept is emphasized. The players realize that anything can happen in this tournament and that they must come ready to play. However, McDowell feels that his team can control their own destiny and likes the focus he sees in his players, especially since they haven't played meaningful games in a while. "It's nice to see no real nervousness. The girls are chomping at the bit, just waiting to get started," he said.

They won't be waiting for long, since their first game is this morning at 8:30 a.m.

ATHLETES OF THE WEEK

Male

While dominating performances are common for the Queen's rugby team, the individual show put on by the Queen's Journal male athlete of the week, was at another level. With all 22 points in a 22-19 Queen's victory over McMaster, Paul Hemings led the Tricolour into the playoffs with a solid victory.

The fourth year fly half not only scored all the points, but he did so in dramatic fashion. After kicking five penalties to keep the team in the game, Hemings scored a try with about one minute remaining, and the Gaels trailing 19-15. Hemings followed the try up with a conversion, pushing Queen's to victory and a 6-1 record.

Despite the fact the team had already clinched second place, this game was important for the team.

"As far as standings were concerned, it wasn't that important, but for the team it was good for getting ready for the playoffs," said Hemings. "Mac is always a tough team, so it was good for us after the loss at Guelph."

With the playoffs looming, the Kingston native has refocused on the game's semi-final opponent, the hated Western Mustangs.

"The win earlier in the year [against the Mustangs] was good, but we finished 15 men [on the field] to their 13," Hemings said. "We feel that we haven't really beaten them and the fact that we lost to them in last year's final is extra incentive."

With a recurring knee injury that flared up after the Mac game, Hemings is not practicing, but feels he will be ready to go by Saturday.

"It is swollen and it is on my kicking leg, but I will have it drained and it shouldn't be a problem," explained the KCVI graduate.

Going into the playoffs, Hemings knows and respects the tradition of excellence that is associated with Queen's rugby.

"The standard was set a long time ago and it is every team's responsibility to maintain that tradition," said Hemings. "So we want to get that championship back from Western."

The tradition continues on Saturday at 1 p.m. at Kingston Field.

Female

With the women's lacrosse team stampeding down the road to championship glory, Silvana Yee has solidified the offence with a deft scoring touch. With her 11 goals against three teams last weekend, she is this week's female Queen's Journal Athlete of the Week.

The 23-year old student from Burlington has already completed a four-year physical education degree at Sir Wilfrid Laurier and is now in her second-year of a physiotherapy degree here at Queen's. Lacrosse Co-coach Nancy Symons describes Yee as "a silent motivator who is very team oriented and a tremendous asset. She contributes a lot to the team on and off the field [and] is a friendly face in the crowd [who] gives advice to other players."

Last summer, Yee tore her ACL and was only playing at about 80 per cent until she had surgery in December. This season, she has made a complete recovery and is playing at full force.

Yee was quick to praise the talented coaching staff of Symons, Darcie Spearling and Anne Bennedetti, referring to them as "the backbone of the team."

The team's closeness both on and off the field is one of its greatest strengths according to Yee. The players regularly get together for drinks and house parties.

This week Yee has been trying to gather material to put together her "Jimi 'Superfly' Snuka" wrestling costume in time for their Halloween party.

Silvana Yee
'Superfly'

"We have a very, very good work ethic," said Yee, "and the team dynamics are phenomenal."

It is refreshing to see a group of athletes that both work and play hard as a team.

Yee and her coaches are very confident that a lacrosse championship will be attained next week in Oshawa. "If we're going to win, this is the year to do it," said Yee.

If she pors another 11 goals, the first women's varsity lacrosse championship will belong to the 1998-99 Gaels.

Love your body

BY GENEVIEVE EASTBROOK

As women, we have to accept that our bodies aren't perfect. Our breasts are too small, our waists, hips and thighs too large. We'll never be quite tall enough, or curvaceous enough, or have enough muscle definition. At least, that is what the fashion, beauty and weight-loss industries would like us to believe. If we didn't, we would stop buying their magazines, diet aids and various other implements of torture that promise to bring us an iota closer to the paragons of perfection that we compare ourselves to.

The modern world isn't going to change overnight, and blaming the media for setting unreachable standards will get us nowhere. It's up to us, as individuals, to stop hating our bodies.

Ironically, as our society has become more affluent, the standard of beauty for women has become increasingly thin. We are bombarded with images of statuesque fashion models, professional female athletes, and actresses with sculpted bodies portraying successful lawyers, doctors, mothers and lovers. We are taught that fat is an evil to be avoided at all costs, and that the overweight are lazy, unhealthy, and lack ambition. Weight loss is seen as the key to attractiveness, success and good health.

However, there is a huge discrepancy between the weight that is considered healthy and that which is perceived as ideal. Not surprisingly, this discrepancy has led to a rise in the prevalence of body image problems among women of increasingly young age groups. One recent study found that nearly half of all Canadian women were trying to lose weight; 37 percent of whom were already at a healthy weight according to the Body Mass index. The same study found that 44 percent of girls between 14 and 18 years of age were actively dieting. The desire to be thin and the restrictive patterns of eating associated with dieting have been linked to the increase in prevalence of weight preoccupation, obsessive exercise, yo-yo dieting, anorexia nervosa and bulimia.

Unfortunately, the modern world isn't going to change overnight, and blaming the media for setting unreachable standards will get us nowhere. It's up to us, as individuals, to stop hating our bodies. The first important step in escaping the negative body image trap is to assess your body image, then decide what changes you can make to create a more positive one.

There is a huge discrepancy between the weight that is considered healthy and that which is perceived as ideal.

The next step is to take action. A few subtle changes can make an enormous difference in how you perceive yourself. Rather than thinking of what you have to lose, think of how you can GAIN: Get Active, stay Informed and Nourish yourself.

Women's tennis wins
OUA title

By ADAM KAMINSKY

The first Queen's OUA Champions of the 1998-99 season have been crowned and they are the members of the women's tennis team. The squad, which dominated regular season play, continued showing their prowess by defeating all cougars at the National Tennis Centre on the campus of York University.

"The outstanding team effort by both the women's and men's teams was evident throughout the season."

— Head Coach John McFarlane

The team, led by captain and Kingston-native Paula Myslivecek, defeated the University of Toronto 4-0 and then dominated McGill by a 4-1 count. The captain managed to extend her unbeaten streak to two full seasons and her contribution to the team's victory can not be overstated.

"Paula Myslivecek's leadership influence both on and off the court was a pivotal difference that contributed to the team's victory," said Head Coach John McFarlane. "She is tenacious, focused and determined and this helped build our team's confidence."

While Myslivecek is clearly the team leader, she was joined by talented teammates Melanee Short, Irene Vasa, Andra Leimanis, Heather Macdonnell, Amy White and Angelica Sandulescu.

The men also participated in the OUA championships at York, but they came up slightly short of their goal, earning a silver medal. The squad, led by captain Mark Connelly, defeated McMaster in semi-final play, 4-3. They followed that up with a tough 4-2 loss at the hands of the University of Western Ontario in the gold medal game.

"The outstanding team effort by both the women's and men's teams was evident throughout the season and with a little bit more good fortune at the team championship, Queen's would have captured two rather than one OUA team championship," said McFarlane.

While this tournament brings an end to the team tennis season, the OUA individual tennis championships will be held this weekend at Laurier University. Queen's will be represented on the men's side by Mark and Kiran Keshave, while on the women's side Myslivecek, Short and Leimanis will be attending. Myslivecek is the defending singles champ and she and Short won the OUA doubles championship last season.

THE WORD ON THE STREET:

YOU KNOW THERE'S a lot wrong with our football every game be a party? Others complain that they have too much homework to take off Saturday afternoon. You don't even want my opinion of these people.

Why is it that Queen's students will only go to a football game if the words "Kill McGill" or "Homecoming" are mentioned in the title? And knowing this, why did the idiots in charge decide to put "Kill McGill" and "Homecoming" on the same day?

You know, around Homecoming I was reading this very publication, and it interviewed a bunch of people saying how great it was that Kill McGill and Homecoming were together because the game would be a sellout. Come on folks, don't you realize that a Kill McGill game can sell itself out, and that a Homecoming game can do the same? Thus, instead of having two big crowds to play in front of, the football team was awarded only one. The marketing genius who came up with that scheduling gem deserves a real prize, if a kick in the teeth is considered a prize.

[People] only go to the big games because they know there will be a big crowd and it will be a party. But if everybody went to every game, wouldn't every game be a party?

Despite the fact that the scheduling must have been done by the same wizard who thought "Night at the Roxbury" would be a good feature length film, I still don't understand the mentality of students here. Why do you only go to Kill McGill or Homecoming games? I mean, it's the same team in the yellow helmets every week. Paul Corrales still runs really fast and scores a bunch of touchdowns. Aru is still on fire. And the likelihood of me flashing you is the same as during Homecoming.

Most say that they only go to the big games because they know there will be a big crowd and it will be a party. But if everybody went to every game, wouldn't every game be a party? Others complain that they have too much homework to take off Saturday afternoon. You don't even want my opinion of these people.

early every Saturday morning, get really drunk, put on their clown wigs and come on down to the football game. Sometimes they watch, sometimes they highland dance at half-time, and sometimes they fall down the stairs and roll onto the track in a drunken stupor. Now if these aren't role models I don't know who are.

Do you know why the ARU CRU are role models? Because when they look back at their memories of Queen's (no matter how fuzzy they are) they will remember more than the interior of the library. That's because they go out and do things. Too many people get too caught up in work at this school. I don't care about your midterms, I don't even know what a midterm is. But I do know that nobody is too busy to take off a Saturday to get drunk and have fun at a football game.

Now I see some of you saying, "You have made some fine points here George, and I would go to the game tomorrow, but I don't know anything about football." That doesn't matter — nobody does. I can honestly say that in four years of going to every Gaels game, home and away, I have never watched one single play. Going to the game is a party — nothing more. All you need to know is when the guy in yellow crosses the line at the end of the field, you do an "Oil Thigh." It is that simple.

So that is my goal for tomorrow: To get every student back to Richardson Stadium to have a wild time again. If Hallowe'en and the Bishop's Gaiters aren't enough inspiration to get up early tomorrow and get really sloshed before heading down to West Campus, I don't know what is.

First years, get your whole floor out and follow the Bands when they come get you at noon. '99s call all your old friends and go to one last football game before you have to sit on the alumni side and listen to those competitive cheerleaders all day long. Second and third years — just show up. We can prove to those scheduling wizards that Queen's students actually have school spirit past September. We can be spirited all the way into late October. That'll show 'em.

If that's not enough inspiration to show up, I'll even make my own sacrifice: For the person who shows up tomorrow in the best Hallowe'en costume, I will personally buy them a case of beer. That's right FREE BEER. Did I mention, FREE BEER!

To summarize: free beer, costumes, drunkenness, highland dancing, football and free beer. Ain't no school work worth missing that for.

George Reinblatt knows nothing about Queen's football, but boy can he dance.

Women's lacrosse expects to dominate final

By ROBERT MACNEIL

With a blazing offence and an impressively stingy defence, the women's lacrosse team is not shy about expressing their confidence about winning their first varsity championship.

This past weekend, the Gaels defeated their three opponents by a combined score of 30-7, including a 14-3 thrashing of York University, who had beaten them each of the last two years in the finals. That phenomenal weekend ensured the Gaels of a first-place finish and an undefeated record. The team is coached by three players: Nancy Symons, Anne Bennedetti and Darcie Spearing. According to these three, this is the most dominant group of athletes they have ever seen.

The real key to this team lies in the fact that every one of their players is able to step up and provide an instant spark to the team's overall performance.

These Gaels are a blend of rookies and veterans who are as close off the field as they are on it. Symons feels that the team "has tremendous individual players" but that the real strong point has been "the raw talent and work ethic."

"[It seems inevitable that Queen's will be ] bringing home the first of many championships."

— Co-coach Darcie Spearing

Bennedetti agrees and is "really impressed with how everyone has come together [and how it has resulted] in such an excellent season."

While the team does not spend much time distributing individual accolades, there are several players that were highlighted by the coaches. Fourth-year rookie goalie Barb Phibbs was recruited from the track and field team this year and has improved consistently every game, solidifying the position. Silvana Yee, the Queen's Journal Athlete of the Week, has been "awesome" according to Bennedetti, especially after she scored a whopping 11 goals in her last three games. Bennedetti is no slouch either, as she scored four goals and three assists in the pummeling of York. Spearing was also involved in the game and contributed a four-goal effort herself.

This team exudes so much confidence that it appears inevitable to them that they will be "bringing home the first of many championships," said Spearing. Symons believes that once they reach the final that "we will win by at least five goals," while Spearing believes "that we could win by even more than that."

"We will win by at least five goals."

— Co-coach Nancy Symons

The coaches recognize that one danger is that the team could be caught off guard when they reach the final. Symons knows, however, that this juggernaut is cruising along and "hasn't had any real nailbiters this year."

The closest the Gaels came to losing a game was their last weekend's win over Toronto. Queen's only lead at the half by a score of 2-1, but turned on the afterburners and won 8-2. Since they are able to turn the offence on and off with a push of the proverbial button, it looks like the coaches will be right and the first of many championship banners will be waving proudly at Queen's after next weekend.

Must win

two at Coulter Field 24-19. While the score wasn't, with the homestanders bursting out to a 21-4 lead by half-time and then expanding it to a 20 point bulge early in the third quarter. The Gaels offence, led by back-up quarterback Dustin Falscheer, did put up some points during the comeback, but it was the improved play of the defence that is most promising.

"Loser loses all, winner wins all."

— Head Coach Bob Howes

"It is encouraging that we played well in the second half," said Queen's Defensive Coordinator Bob Mullen. "I hope we have adjusted to their wing-T attack, but this is a good offence that moved the ball up and down the field against Ottawa."

It is the uniqueness of Bishop's wing-T offence, a running style popularized in Texas during the fifties and sixties, that makes this offence so difficult to defend against. In the first encounter on September 12, the Gaels saw diminutive Bishop's tailback Ben Ouimet run for 130 yards and strapping fullback O.J. Burnett, who currently leads the conference in rushing, run for over 70 yards and a touchdown.

Ouimet has since been displaced in the line-up by Rich Bailey, who has had some huge games for the Gaels. The key to their offence remains their quarterback, Mark Stepe, who is an exceptional athlete. It will be important for the Gaels front seven, most notably Jim 'the Sack Guru' Aru and Derek Spronck, to provide pressure, especially with the loss of veteran defensive back Max Turner to suspension, due to transgressions against Laval, and back-up safety Al McNish to injury.

"We have always been thin at defensive secondary, but now we are really thin back there," explained Mullen. "However, they set up the pass with the run, so if we can't stop the run, we're dead anyway."

Offensively, the Gaels were able to rack up 472 yards in the first encounter, but the problems shown during that game remain concerns. The team fumbled the ball twice and threw four interceptions, many of which were deep in Gaiter territory. If the team is to move on to the playoffs, they will have to cure these ills. Coach Yovetich is pleased with the execution in the middle of the field, but extremely frustrated by the inefficiency near the goal line.

Bishop's will counter the Gaels' second ranked offence with the best linebacking corps in the conference. With all-Canadian Rob Smith, potential conference all-star Hugh Irwin and improving outside linebacker Matt Robichaud patrolling the field, running the ball becomes difficult. The Gaitsers also have a solid secondary, led by Errol Powell, who is tied for the conference lead in interceptions. While this defence is rated only fifth in the conference, it is much better than that on the field.

"I hope we have adjusted to their wing-T attack, but this is a good offence that moved the ball up and down the field against Ottawa."

— Coach Bob Mullen

"They have great linebackers, but we have to go to where they are going to be and not where they were and block them," explained Yovetich.

Both teams know that they are better than their sub-500 records and want to prove it on the larger stage of the playoffs. The Gaitsers come into this game knowing that they have beaten the Gaels before. Queen's knows that they are playing in the friendly confines of Richardson Stadium, where they have lost twice in three years.

Coach Howes described the implications of this game in only one sentence. "Loser loses all, winner wins all."

In the nude: Bif gets burnt at AJ's.

CONCERT REVIEW

Bif Naked
AJ's Hangar
Wednesday, October 28

By JEFF CHILD

Hallowe'en started early at AJ's Hangar on Wednesday night, as acclaimed Vancouver band Bif Naked was in town to play some of their spooky hard rock riffs. Lead by the 27-year-old New Delhi-born frontwoman and official band captain Betj Torbert, the band is currently promoting their new album I Bifcuss and I had the chance to check them out.

The Wednesday night concert at AJ's immediately got off on the wrong foot, as the atmosphere inside was not first rate. If you ever get tired of hanging out with the same old crowd, head down to AJ's for an alternative. Where else can you find a mixture of middle-age Kingston residents, obviously under-agers and students of higher learning all in the same building. I thought I was in a line at the post office! However, within the faceless masses, the Bif Naked supporters emerged tattoos and body piercing intact. It was actually encouraging to see that Kingston's squeegee kids could bum enough change to get into the show. But, contrary to popular belief, you don't have to display tattoos and body piercing to dig Bif's music.

Fully Exposed

Bif Naked gets dirty, but not down

The evening began with the opening act Made, a five-piece power-pop outfit. Characterized by their well-engineered sound, the tight and energetic opening songs riveted through the crowd, pounding its soul. Soon after, however, their songs seemed to mesh together into one monotonous, generic tune that seemed to never end. This unintentional medley never really capitalized on the energy of their opening tunes and turned me completely off the band. Needless to say they Made me nauseous.

Bif Naked then unfortunately had to follow the anti-energy of Made. Torbert started off the set with an eerie vocal solo; her melodic howls seduced and engulfed the large crowd. As her voice carried like a siren over the entire bar, even AJ's bouncers stopped flexing their steroid-infested chest muscles for a moment to take in the beautiful sounds. Bif's mixture of hard grinding rock and rhythmic ballads periodically kept the audience entertained.

Sporting jet-black hair, dark eye shadow and an array of tattoos, Torbert presented a tough and raunchy image. As a budding performer, however, she vocalized her thoughts genuinely and passionately. From revelations of child abuse to pulpy love ballads, she tried to conquer all. However, despite Bif's extensive creative arsenal, they quickly ran out of ammunition. The show lacked uniqueness and left me waiting for a climax.

The show never really got off the ground on Wednesday night, which is unfortunate considering the uniqueness of a female-led alternative band. For the most part, the evening was lacking an intensity that should have been expected with an act as charged as Bif Naked. Hopefully on their return to Kingston, Bif Naked can inspire with more than Torbert's Hallowe'en costume.

Rotate this!

Various Artists
Hallowe'en Hootenanny
Geffen Records

By KEN BUTLAND

Hallowe'en Hootenanny is what happens when Rob Zombie decides to cross campy Hallowe'en horror themes with hard rock. This musical collaboration of bands on the Geffen record label would go over well at a dancy/drinky holiday bash. It doesn't make well for private listening though.

The bulk of its tracks are mono-thematic. There's a song about vampires, two about werewolves... you get the idea. Strangely enough, all of the material is inoffensive, and censor-friendly, to the point of being flaccid. The A&P might want a copy to loop as Kingston nears October 31.

As for a breakdown of genre, the album is mainly surf rock, with some blues/rock and metal tossed in. Nothing really stands out except for the xylophone and muted trumpets on a track by Frenchy called "Ribcage Mambo" (also the collection's only entry with a female lead singer).

Other than that, the record's only high points are Los Straitjackets' cover of the "The Munsters" theme song set to surf rock, and Zacherle (with Southern Culture on the Skids) with a song called "Sinister Purpose," that is reminiscent of the old Monster Mash tune.

The collection gets tiring to listen to after the first few tracks. Most songs sound much the same, and a couple sound identical: there's this one guitar riff that seems to have been passed around from band to band and recorded over and over for some reason.

This makes Hallowe'en Hootenanny one of those albums that you'll play one or two times, get your fill, bring to a party and not cry when some drunk dick likes the CD's attractive cover so much that he or she decides to steal it.

Return of the Living Dead

By MASOCHIST MURRAY

In the modern Southern United States graveyard genre, Return of the Living Dead is the defining punk-rockers versus zombies flick.

Shot with a modest budget of $85, and wallpapered in horror cliché and dark humour, this movie is as "B" as they come.

Based on the premise that George Romero's classic zombie flick Night of the Living Dead was a true story, this unofficial sequel takes place in the early eighties at an obscure medical storage facility in Kentucky, conveniently located next to a graveyard and crematorium. A strange zombie mist is released from the military canisters housing the lifeless characters from Romero's classic, and is then deposited into the soil of an adjoining graveyard during a timely thunderstorm. What results is an awesome display of the brain-eating undead going head to head with a gang of brainless eighties punks.

Throughout this titanic battle, an undercurrent of tastelessness shines through, giving this movie its tone.

For example, the decision to name the Crematorium character after a notorious Auschwitz Nazi was crude, and the scenes of brutal sexual slayings of completely unclad bimbos lack sensitivity. However, in a morbid sort of way, the ability to offend is a trademark of any good "B" movie and for the most part Return of the Living Dead is entertaining. Inundated with bad make-up, shaky acting, suspect editing, unnecessary nudity and midgets, this movie is the hands down Oscar winner in the cheap-ass horror flick category.

Now if you want a quality "Hollywood" horror flick go and rent Scream, but if you want a truly entertaining and mindless evening stick with this piece of camp.

The Shining

By KILLER KIM

Cinematic god Stanley Kubrick was once asked to describe the nature of his film The Shining. His reply? "There's something inherently wrong with the human personality," he said "There's an evil side to it."

With this notion of the human psyche, Kubrick creates quite a horrorshow with The Shining. The film relies, to no surprise, on the eccentric, and with the talent of Kubrick, it becomes more than a just a regular Hallowe'en horror flick — it's twisted, potent celluloid that causes the heart to beat faster. The Shining is based on the Stephen King novel of the same name. Kubrick takes the supermarket paperback and constructs a film that is reminiscent of A Clockwork Orange and 2001: A Space Odyssey in that his technological genius resurfaces to tell a complex story.

The film opens with a moving aerial view of mountainous areas which acts as a nauseating preview of the upcoming events.

Bad boy Jack Nicholson plays Jack Torrance, a writer who takes on the position of winter caretaker at the Overlook Hotel. The hotel can only be reached by a steep winding road, which is the reason why one family must be hired to keep it up during the winter. What the Torrance family doesn't realize is the murderous history behind the structure.

Shelley Duvall is the overly distraught wife, Wendy, who not only fends off her husband's explosive nature, but is wary of her young son Danny's (a frightening portrayal by a young Danny Lloyd) neurotic imbalance. Danny's psychic abilities enables him to witness the horror of the past victims of the hotel. The composition of all three disturbed characters develops into a hotbed of blood floods and axe-murders.

If anything, one of the most appealing characteristics of the The Shining is Kubrick's ability to sneak in the cinematic weirdness that made all of his film's a cult hit. Slow but loud movements such as the use of an axe in conjunction with Wendy screaming, is one of the methodical intricacies that makes the film frustrating and haunting.

No matter what sort of state you watch this film in, the result is just the same. Kubrick leaves the audience feeling as if someone is watching you behind a invisible window. So take a room at the Overlook Hotel, and you'll see why "all work and no play makes Jack a very dull boy."

Pumpkinhead

By CRAZY CROSSBIE

Horror films are meant to be scary. Many do not succeed at this task, but few fail the way Pumpkinhead does. Released in 1988, Stan Winston's "stylish and atmospheric" film generates nothing but boredom. In fact it's safe to say that the slimy, wet, seed-filled interior of a pumpkin is scarier than Pumpkinhead.

Alfie's Pub spins into the underground

BATTLE OF THE DJ'S

Alfie's Pub
Wednesday, October 28

By CHAD DAVIS

"Fuck it. We can make a dead man move. We can make a shadow dance." — Ali Place: Alfie's. Time: 10 p.m. Wednesday, October 28, 1998. Stepping up to the turntables were seven competitors spinning for an unfortunately sparse crowd. These DJs put themselves out for the dedicated heads who were obviously fending for bears.

First to the stage was DJ Melt who presented a monotonous, commercial House set that left the listeners unsatisfied with the lack of scratching and his lacklustre mixing.

Shinobi then took the crowd by surprise, opening with superb scratching over underground Hip Hop beats. He gained the crowd's respect and applause during the fast and furious cutting in the middle of his performance.

The third DJ of the night was DJ Under who presented a funky House set. His performance was average due to the absence of mixing and scratching skills.

DJ Mythic then took control of the audience with the powerful, underground House tracks that he presented in a slowly building set. His rhythm and mixing skills set him apart from the previous House DJs of the night.

Fifth up to the tables was Neil Brown who opened well with old school Hip Hop and beat juggling, but failed to recover after stopping his performance to adjust the gain levels. Though his friends attempted to support him, their rhythmless dancing detracted from his performance.

The highlight of the night was Ali, who opened with a Peter Pan record and smoothly mixed in DiscoHouse. The listeners cheered as he cut over House and freaked the mixer, displaying versatility rarely seen in DJs.

The last up was DJ Mindfield who had a nice intro scratching and beat juggling classic Hip Hop but suffered from mistakes later in the set. The meshing of Hip Hop and Country as the finale to his set was unique.

Though [Neil Brown's] friends attempted to support him, their rhythmless dancing detracted from his performance.

The second round of the competition is next Wednesday, November 4 at Alfie's. Shinobi, DJ Mythic, Neil Brown, and Ali will be spinning for $500 in prize money and studio time. The opportunity to see four quality turntablists perform at Queen's in one night is rare.

Rotting pumpkin

invade a small town, causing ridiculous havoc by riding their dirtbikes around the sandy lowlands. This horrific, scandalous act stirs anger and fear in the members of the small town, because everyone knows dirtbikers are children of the devil. The so-called excitement of the movie ensues when a small child is killed by being bonked on the head by an overzealous and drunk dirt-biker.

When the child's father, Ed Harvey (played by Lance Henriksen of Millennium fame), discovers his dead tyke, he becomes consumed with avenging his son's death. He travels to the graveyard and digs up the body of Pumpkinhead. Harvey is no stranger to the fang-bearing, slime-dripping, blood-sucking Pumpkinhead because he saw the creature when he was a child. The rest of the movie is spent with the devious Pumpkinhead killing the bad bikers.

Eventually, like every good protagonist, Harvey cannot let Pumpkinhead finish what it started. I would like to say this is where Pumpkinhead gets interesting, but I can't. From here on in, this hour and 27 minute flop gets somewhat more absorbing, but there is never a time when Pumpkinhead generates any fear.

What is most questionable about Pumpkinhead is that, at no point is the legend of Pumpkinhead explained. The viewer is given no explanation of the history of the creature or why or how it exists.

More crazy, however, is the title of the movie. Pumpkinhead, to me, invokes the image of a monster with, if not a pumpkin for a head, at least some pumpkin-like qualities. Slime, seeds, or even triangular-shaped eyes would have defined Pumpkinhead as a monster with pumpkin-patch roots.

However, the evil-killing-creature-thing featured in this movie shows that Slime Thing or Rotting Teeth Eyeball Sucker would have been a more appropriate title. No pumpkin exists at anytime in the movie; thus, I think it is really wrong that the producers of this film, Howard Smith and Richard C. Weinman used a traditional Halloween image to get people to watch their piece of extraordinarily bad crap.

The only saving grace of this movie is at the beginning, when for at least five minutes, you get to see the erect nipples of Henriksen, who undoubtedly would be horrified at his early acting work.

I wouldn't even recommend this movie as a background flick for a Halloween party. Except for the nipples, Pumpkinhead is a ghostly, deadly bore.

Kingston residents were quick to express sadness and extend their sympathies to the non-profit theatre, the closing of the Princess Court Cinema may be beneficial for independent film in Kingston. The loss of the city's only venue for alternative fare is clearly difficult to bear, but the possible formation of a more consistent cinema that offers more variety than the Princess Court is certainly appealing.

For all of the theatre's virtue as a non-mainstream, locally-owned and non-profit operation, a gap existed between what the Princess Court Cinema was and what theatre-goers wanted it to be. Perhaps due to sharp financial restraints, the cinema was notorious for long runs and a somewhat unpredictable schedule. The past two years clearly demonstrated the need for Princess Court to evolve or die. The theatre's staff was systematically reduced to a final resting place of a mere three persons; with the staff reduction came a proportionate drop in the capacity of the theatre to offer the quality of

No Prince Charming to wake this Sleeping Beauty

By JESSE CRAIG BELLINGER

The Princess Court Cinema closed its doors two weeks ago in what may be the final act in a long-brewing tragedy.

The downtown theatre, long besieged with financial difficulties resulting from poor attendance but highly-regarded within the Kingston community, was operated with only a skeletal staff during the past 12 months in an effort to cut costs. Despite a creative deal with Alliance Communications, a major Canadian studio and one of Princess Court's principle creditors, and a fund-raising campaign in co-operation with the popular Grizzly Grill restaurant, the independent theatre could not raise the necessary funds to continue to operate.

While many long-time patrons and

How committed was the Princess Court to saving itself?

Such lack of activity on the part of the theatre begs the question: how committed was the Princess Court to saving itself? When the local media was informed that owner Shane McGee had struck a deal with the cinema's major creditor, Alliance Films, to repay the theatre's outstanding $13,000 debt, something akin to optimism stirred in theatre-goers hearts. Under the terms of the deal, Alliance was to allow the PCC to choose any films from the distributor's vault free of charge; as such, PCC could afford to screen a wide variety of big-ticket films from past and present and, with the increased revenue generated from larger audiences, pay off Alliance and get back on their feet. It sounded like, in any event, Kingston audiences would get treated to some interesting cinema. Sadly, the summer passed without incident and the PCC quietly shut its doors nearly two weeks ago.

What went wrong? McGee alleges that the theatre closed due to lack of attendance. But how could he expect his customers to offer support when the same film would be screened for weeks at a time? There was no significant change in the PCC's schedule that signified the sudden cornucopia that the Alliance deal was expected to produce; although the distributors quickly sent off Michael entertainment to which its patrons had grown accustomed.

An under-publicized and obviously-ineffective fundraising venture with neighbouring Grizzly Grill does not constitute a determined effort to save the cinema.

As the Cinema went through its death throes this summer, woefully little was done to publicize the theatre's plight. I would submit that this was further evidence of the impossibility of running a successful theatre with such a skeletal staff — there was simply no paid employee that could commit the time required to forming and executing a viable pitch to save the ailing theatre. An under-publicized and obviously-ineffective fundraising venture with neighbouring Grizzly Grill does not constitute a determined effort to save the cinema.

Such lack of activity on the part of the theatre begs the question: how committed was the Princess Court to saving itself? When the local media was informed that owner Shane McGee had struck a deal with the cinema's major creditor, Alliance Films, to repay the theatre's outstanding $13,000 debt, something akin to optimism stirred in theatre-goers hearts. Under the terms of the deal, Alliance was to allow the PCC to choose any films from the distributor's vault free of charge; as such, PCC could afford to screen a wide variety of big-ticket films from past and present and, with the increased revenue generated from larger audiences, pay off Alliance and get back on their feet. What went wrong? McGee alleges that the theatre closed due to lack of attendance. But how could he expect his customers to offer support when the same film would be screened for weeks at a time? There was no significant change in the PCC's schedule that signified the sudden cornucopia that the Alliance deal was expected to produce; although the distributors quickly sent off Michael Moore's The Big One in early summer, it was not until September that the PCC finally screened the long-overdue Smoke Signals.

Magge insists that the Alliance deal failed on the distributors part, alleging that while the company paid lip service to the idea of doing their part to sustain the PCC, their offer amounted only to carefully orchestrated politics. The effect of the summer's lacklustre effort, regardless of blame, was decidedly negative. The variety of the screenings did not increase and audiences are notoriously fickle, even those who care about their venue. Sadly, the venue in question had reached the end of its run.

No plans are concrete at this time, but even the possibility of such a venture indicates that the PCC did not close due to a lack of a market.

Allowing for the requisite sadness that accompanies the loss of something familiar, the closure of the PCC is a chance for independent, alternative theatre to re-establish itself in Kingston. The PCC most of us knew represented the evolution of a film series offered by the Queen's Film Department during the 1980s. Blaine Allen, chairperson of Queen's Film Department is attempting to initiate a re-organization of the original project. No plans are concrete at this time, but even the possibility of such a venture indicates that the PCC did not close due to a lack of a market, as Magge claimed. There is room for foreign, independent and alternative cinema in Kingston. In fact, there is more room than the PCC was able to fill; in the end, it was the theatre's failings that led to its downfall, not the audience's.

It is unlikely that even a resurrected

Queen's Film Series can satiate Kingston's appetite for alternative cinema. But it is an important start in not only maintaining quality cinema in Kingston but improving it. The closing of the Princess Court Cinema, while unfortunate in its own right, offers a valuable opportunity for change. Meanwhile, the former patrons of the PCC cross their fingers and hope that change will equal growth.

Rave on!

Culture of beats, dance and dope catches on

By TRUNG NGUYEN

There was a time when "alternative music" meant an alternative to popular music. What it didn't mean was Top-10 radio play, a record contract with a corporate giant, and all-expense paid world-wide tours. So what exactly does alternative mean in our little post-post-modern world of music?

Alternative music in the past has been dynamic and ever-changing. This is why alternative is not a genre of music so much as it is a point in the continuum of musical imagination. It is a reaction, an instigator, and an underground movement of counterculture. Sounds a lot like something that does exist today: raving.

Ask anyone what a rave is, and they'll tell you something different from the next person. Perhaps it is exactly this ambiguity and unwillingness to be compartmentalized that has kept rave alive for so long. Much like the hippie movement of the sixties and the punk movement of the seventies, rave represents an alternative to popular music in the nineties. Yet unlike its predecessors, rave is not a reaction to politics. Rave culture is characterized by its electronically driven music, its all-night smorgasbord of dancing, and its distinctive way of dress.

Raving can be traced back to the mid-eighties, when youth in England would congregate at secret locations to hold parties in order to escape the overbearing eye of parents and law enforcement. Its introduction into North-America brought with it a kind of metamorphosis. Promoters caught on to the money-making opportunity of holding raves which had the potential to attract thousands, perhaps even tens of thousands of people.

Today, raving thrives worldwide, recently surfacing its head into the mainstream with the popularization of electronica bands. In Canada, urban centres such as Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver may have several raves held on any given weekend. Some, such as the World Electronic Music Festival held on Christian Island in Muskoka this past summer, last the whole weekend.

The experience of a rave is just that: an experience. They usually start around 10 p.m., and go for about 12 hours. Most of this time is spent dancing, an almost tribal and ritualistic practice. Some ravers use glow sticks as eye candy. Others blow on whistles and noisemakers as they dance. The light show and sound system at most of the bigger raves are usually top notch, since rave companies can generate the revenue to rent such equipment through ticket sales, tickets can run anywhere from $10 - $40. Ravers often dance for hours on end, achieving a trance-like state of euphoria and unity with the crowd. This can be a potentially dangerous thing for inexperienced ravers though, as the temptation to keep dancing overshadows physical exhaustion. As long as you remember to take frequent breaks to catch your breath and drink water you'll be okay.

Raves have often been depicted in the media as being a hotbed for illegal drug use. Stories of deaths resulting from overdose at raves have led the public to believe that rave culture is a drug culture. The fact is that while drugs are prevalent at raves, they are not what raves are "about." Saying that raves are about drugs is analogous to saying that rock concerts are about drugs. Almost all of the deaths that have occurred have been a result of hyperthermia (heat exhaustion), not overdosing. The deaths that have been documented become sensationalized, further proliferating the misconception that drugs are the defining factor for the experience. In reality, the use of drugs is a personal decision, and should not be used to characterize rave culture.

Queen's University has a small but vibrant population of rave aficionados.

The most popular drug used at raves is Ecstasy, also known as E, X, XTC and a plethora of other colourful names. Up until 1984, it was legal in the U.S. The drug is generally composed of a combination of amphetamine (speed) and MDMA (methyl-dioxymeta-amphetamine, which is the actual ecstasy itself), although other combinations exist. Ecstasy works by manipulating the serotonin levels of the brain, thus bringing about a sense of contentment and well-being, dissolving inhibitions, and dually stimulating and relaxing the muscles of the body. Other drugs such as marijuana and GHB (gamma-hydroxybutyrate) are also used by ravers, although not nearly as much as ecstasy.

My own initiation into rave culture happened a few years back while I was in high school. A friend of mine had introduced me to some electronic music, and I immediately took a liking to its incredible energy. We decided to check out a place in Toronto called the Boom Boom Room which featured Dr. Trance, a popular radio DJ who spun trance and ambient music (sub-genres of electronic). Although I had read about raving and was well aware of the wild and colourful atmosphere at raves, nothing could have prepared me for what I was about to get myself into. People came dressed in anything from butterfly wings to metallic silver jumpsuits. Needless to say, I felt a little out of place in my Levi's 501's and Calvin Klein shirt.

The funny thing was that my apprehension melted soon after I entered the club. The people there didn't seem to care how I was dressed. Many who were there approached my friend and I simply to chat and engage in small talk. This openness and acceptance was perhaps what I remember most about my first rave experience.

While rave has been around for quite some time now, it has yet to be ingested and regurgitated by MTV and MuchMusic for public consumption. It's arguable that rave is no longer alternative, as the line between mainstream music and electronica becomes more and more blurred. When you add the fact that raves are becoming more and more popular among weekend clubbers, the alternative moniker becomes inaccurate.

Rave culture has responded to this popularization by splitting into sub-cultures. Now, there are raves which specifically cater to one of several styles of music such as techno, house, hip-hop, hardcore, trance, ambient, jungle, industrial, drum 'n bass, etc. This compartmentalization of electronica has kept underground enthusiasts hopeful that their culture won't be sucked into the vacuum of popular music.

Queen's University has a small but vibrant population of rave aficionados. Campus bars give at best, a sidelong glance to rave-type parties, although Clark Hall has recently started holding house and techno nights for the past few Saturdays. Yet, despite efforts to unite ravers, there has been a prevailing sense of disarray amongst Queen's ravers, perhaps because of the small numbers. Additionally, there is really no place to rave in Kingston, at least not on the scale of even a modest Toronto party. This may not be a bad thing though. Ravers thrive on their invisibility and their insistence on remaining underground. Maybe this is exactly why rave has remained an alternative, and stayed alive all these years.

EVIL!

*Darkness falls across the land
The midnight hour is close at hand
Creatures crawl in search of blood
To terrorize your neighbourhood*

*And whosoever shall be found
Without the soul for getting down
Must stand and face the hounds of hell
And rot inside a corpse's shell*

*The foulest stench is the air
The funk of 40,000 years
And grisly ghouls from every tomb
Are closing in to seal your doom*

*And though you fight to stay alive
Your body starts to shiver
For no mere mortal can resist
The evil of the Thriller*

(fade into maniacal laugh, in deep echo)
— Vincent Price's "rap" at the end of Michael Jackson's "Thriller."

GOOD EVENING. As it's Halloween, the subject of tonight's lecture is "evil." Some of you might be wondering why I've chosen to introduce such a disturbing topic by quoting from a song by Michael Jackson, an artist whose best days are clearly behind him. Well, boys and girls, Michael Jackson and evil have a lot in common. For example, both are scary, scary things and both cause a lot of problems for children. And, just like Michael Jackson, evil's best days are behind it. At first glance this may seem a bit odd. I mean, shouldn't I be complaining that evil is too rampant, too indiscriminate and too nasty? Well no, quite the contrary, I think this is precisely where evil in the 1990s has failed. Good evil (a strange oxymoron, eh?) SHOULD be rampant, indiscriminate and nasty. That's its purpose. No, my beef with today's breed of evil is that it's mindless, lacking style, and utterly, utterly dull.

Human beings don't take enough time to get in touch with the dark side

Now, when I say this, I'm not talking about the evil committed by the Ted Bundy's and Charles Manson's of the world. Although their crimes are horrific, people like this only come along once in a blue moon. Even when they do, their atrocities are usually committed too far away to really frighten us any more than your average TV movie of the week.

No, I'm talking about the stale brand of evil Queen's students have to deal with everyday in real life. The professor who gives the class beauty queen a good mark because she makes doe eyes at him; the housemate who, in a fit of the late-night munchies, eats your leftover pizza even though he knows you were specially saving it for lunch the next day; the friend who, for no other reason than boredom, breaks all the tips off your nicely sharpened pencils.

This is the kind of drab, standard-issue evil we face, or commit, on a daily basis. It's not much fun, or even interesting — it's just annoying. This is where Halloween comes in. On October 31, the elements of evil transform from the mundane to the exciting. It's an occasion when we're actually encouraged to celebrate and imitate monsters which are not bound by the dull complexities of human existence. Vampires, ghouls and witches have a lot more personality and character than your average Queen's evil-doer. For one thing, these creatures are truly and completely malevolent. They never for a moment doubt their purpose: to cause as much destruction as possible. And here's the kicker — they do it because they like it. Guilt is never a consideration. That's certainly a far cry from the hored pencil breaker.

would be a fine idea to mix crazy glue with last week's gravy and put the resulting mess in our housemate's shampoo bottle.

The point is, in the confusing shades of grey that make up the grey matter of the human soul, some shades are considerably darker than others.

The cartoon strip Calvin and Hobbes illustrates this idea perfectly, as long you subscribe to the theory that Hobbes is a figment of Calvin's imagination (as opposed to the theory that Hobbes can spontaneously change from stuffed animal to jungle predator without anyone becoming the wiser). If you accept the

There is something very liberating and empowering about donning the black cape of a vampire or hat of a witch on Halloween. For one night we can step outside ourselves and pretend to be an all-powerful agent of agony, free from the burden of a conscience. And that brings me to my next point — that human beings don't take enough time to get in touch with the dark side of themselves. I'm not a philosopher or a psychologist, so I don't profess to understand human nature, but I do know that all people — even the guy in the Barney suit — are capable of committing evil. In our heads we have little angelic voices telling us to send flowers to mom on her birthday, but there's also those irritatingly tempting voices that try to persuade us that if former, then the two characters can be seen to represent the different sides of Calvin's personality. Hobbes is the good half, the one who tries to be a good friend through all of his companion's shenanigans. The other half, the bad half, is represented by the six-year-old boy — you know, the character who constructs elaborate death scenes with snowmen, threatens to flush his babysitter's science notes down the toilet (in exchange for a more reasonable bedtime), and daydreams about carnivorous dinosaurs making lunch out of Susie Derkins. So, given that we have both good and bad bits to us, why don't we treat them more equally? This is the hypocrisy surrounding Halloween. It's the only night of the year when we embrace those things we attempt to shun and eradicate the other 364 days of the year. Think about it. It's okay to carry an scythe around if you're dressed as the Grim Reaper on Halloween, but do it in February, and you run the risk of being incarcerated in one of a variety of correctional facilities. Similarly, you might be an expert on witchcraft, but if the date on your Dilbert desk calendar reads something other than October 31, nobody wants to hear about it.

My beef with today's breed of evil is that it's mindless, lacking style, and utterly, utterly dull

So why is evil granted legitimacy for only one night each year? Does that mean that we have only one evil part to our personality for every 364 good ones? If this were true, it would mean that evil represented only 0.0027 per cent of the human soul. This is ludicrous, and I'll prove it. Try to think of the last 365 conscious decisions you made. How many were of an evil nature?

Decision 1 — Get up at 8 a.m.

Decision 2 — Grah a shower, using apple-scented shampoo

Decision 3 — Get dressed, wearing that new shirt you hope will attract that cute individual in your morning lecture

Decision 4 — Rush out the door to make class on time

Evil alert! You've decided to skip breakfast, the most important meal of the day. This isn't healthy and you know it. And why haven't you brushed your teeth? Oral hygiene might not be important to you, but pity that cute individual who now has to smell your morning breath in the lecture hall. See? We're only four decisions into a typical day and already you've committed not one, but two evil acts. Don't worry, I'm not going to blame you for it. All I wanted to do was demonstrate that people are more naughty than one might think.

So now that we know we're more than 0.0027 per cent evil, it's clear that we need more time to explore that fact. This 365:1 ratio of good days to evil days is unhealthy, because it doesn't provide balance. It doesn't reflect who we really are. We need more opportunities to embrace the shadowy pieces of our personality, to redefine our self-image as both good and evil creatures.

Only one Halloween per year simply won't do. Ideally, we should have at least one Halloween per week, maybe every Monday, because everyone hates Mondays anyway.

Alas, I know this will never happen. Besides the logistical problems of adding 51 more Halloweens per year, people are too afraid to conduct dark inspections on a regular basis. Face it: we don't really want to see what's down there, in the blackest depths of our soul. Who knows what we might find.

Keith Gerein is going out as a flasher on Halloween night... he's evil, evil!

NAKED BELLIGERENT PANTIES

Wild and crazy guys Steve Martin and Jon Stewart let the ink do the joking

BY SEAN SPRINGER

Pure Drivel
By Steve Martin
Hyperion, $26.95

Naked Pictures of Famous People
By Jon Stewart
Rob Weisbach Books, $30

(Reader flips to article and begins reading.) Well, EXCUUUUSE MEEEE!!! (Pause for laughter and/or moans then recollection.)

Sorry, I don't normally use capital letters so early in a review, but your attention spans are a little scanty and this most uncouth behaviour must stop. (Bit of laughter, tiny applause.) Good.

To begin, let's set the mood properly by adopting a sophisticated, yet whimsical attitude in honour of the brilliantly silly nature of the two authors up for laughs, comedians Steve Martin and Jon Stewart.

Now, if you would please, place a dust-buster next to your left ear, press 'on,' dislodge any lard and/or wax from the ever-so-important 'brain area' and lend your complete attention to the capital letter H.

Just for kicks, let's pretend that H, standing for 'Humour,' or 'Hee Haw,' is the universal comedic measurement of laughs per joke where one H is equivalent to one full laugh (i.e. HA HA HA HA ha huh huhhh) per three-sentence gag. In an attempt to assess the authors' work in a scientific, comical method that parallels their twisted takes on the psychology of humour, the 'Hee Haw' will serve as our grading system for their respective anthologies, which I hold in my hands right now. In my left hand, I hold Pure Drivel, a sophisticated medley of clever essays written by Steve Martin featuring quirks and quips of Martin's brilliant foolishness and irrelevant wisdom that straddle satire and silliness. Martin, quite possibly the funniest man in America next to Garry Shandling, has already seen over half of this anthology published in the The New Yorker's "Shouts & Murmurs" section.

In my right hand, I hold Naked Pictures of Famous People, by Jon Stewart — also an occasional visitor to "Shouts & Murmurs."

Similarly, this book is a collection of satirical articles exuding an intellectual persona that creates an enchanting mental atmosphere in a cryptic yet inexplicably gregarious style. Stewart, who isn't nearly as famous as Martin but famous nonetheless, is a stand-up comic who was the host of his own talk show from 1993-95 and also a creative consultant on The Larry Sanders Show and the sometimes host of Tom Snyder's Late Late Show on CBS.

Reminiscent of Martin's stand-up routines, the book echoes his ingenuity in a subtle, lively way. The seemingly nonsensical nature of his work contrasts beautifully with Martin's gift for poetry.

Both collections ask the reader to think before passing from one sentence to the next. The laughs are aplenty, but beware, they often go deeper than the ink.

To demonstrate, Naked Pictures has the upper-hand in weight as its 163 pages of comedy overrides Pure Drivel's humble 104. It is reasonable, then, to expect Stewart's book to contain more laughs, right? Well, no. The scales tip when taking the laughter density constant 'h' into consideration with Martin scoring a whopping 36 Hee Haws as opposed to Stewart with 33.8. In light of a standard deviation of 7 H, we'll call it a tie.

Stewart veers off into a mysterious part of the brain asking us to imagine a mental photograph of a familiar icon and let the imagination go coo-coo crazy.

While both books achieve a harmonious ebb of humour by writing in varying levels of irony, wit and pure silliness, their respective tones differ slightly. Martin seeks to swing playful jabs at faceless caricatures where Stewart is more mischievous, wielding a machete that gashes open the images of 'real characters' like the Taco Bell chihuahua, Leonardo da Vinci, Adolf Hitler and America On-Line chat room babblers in a nasty but somehow classy way.

Martin's less offensive style makes his job tougher as the inclination to 'laugh at' must always be suppressed by the desire to 'laugh with.' Reaching the exalted state of 'Drivel' (senseless talk, or twaddle, according to the dictionary) is like scaling Mount Everest without footwear. Pure Drivel is an all-together much more complex slab of cheese that was rumoured to have been lost with the ancient Egyptians only to be revisited by Martin in this book, what I'd call a sort of New Testament of Pure Drivel.

Laying a modern twist on the ancient art of Drivel, the 56-year-old actor/comedian/playwright/author writes about a Mars Probe discovery of three-month-old kittens, the outcry due to a shortage of periods in the Times Roman font and "The Sledge-hammer: How It Works."

Like Martin's stand-up routines, the book echoes his ingenuity in a subtle, lively way. The seemingly nonsensical nature of his work contrasts beautifully with Martin's gift for poetry.

In writing this review, actually, I picked up more than a few good tips from Martin's "Writing is Easy" chapter. For example, "Dagnabbit" will never get you anywhere with the Booker Prize people. Lose it." So I lost it. And I bet you're wondering why we used our rather eye-catching title of "Naked Belligerent Panties." Well, as Martin writes, "This is a good sexy title with a lot of promise." "Funny" is a good word to describe Naked Pictures, but I prefer a different phrase: "twisted comedy." Stewart veers off into a mysterious part of the brain asking us to imagine a mental photograph of a familiar icon and let the imagination go coo-coo crazy.

In "Martha Stewart's Vagina," the author slides off her entire wardrobe garment by garment, until a fully nude Martha lies before us stark naked revealing her psychotic personality and vulgar nature. Disrobed, the divine Miss Stewart relates her tips for providing "...a more versatile and productive vagina." Women, she says, consider turning your vagina into an office installed with "Phone, fax and computer on sliding trays [to] give access to whatever you're using..." And for those private moments, "A porch swing suspended by birch branches provides a welcome respite from daily travails."

And leaping out of the underground to pay up for his crimes is Adolf Hitler in "Adolf Hitler: The Larry King Interview." Finally, we get to hear his side of the story: "...I wasn't a happy kid. I mean, I'm not trying to make excuses, but you go through high school with one testicle and the nickname Shitler..I'm sorry, they can bleed that, right?"

But his most outrageous essay has to be "The Last Supper, Or The Dead Waiter." Stewart writes in the voice of a jaded Jewish waiter who serves Jesus and the 12 apostles at the last supper:

Matthew has to sit next to Jesus but John is having none of it, because his birth day's Monday and Jesus promised. Simon's blowing into his hand and pretending he farted...The way they all behaved, I should have made them order off the children's menu...One of them actually snapped his fingers at me for a water refill. Not even to drink. He wanted to wash Jesus' feet! That's right, feet. Right at the table...The only beverage they ordered, one glass of house red. They all split it. Hello! Misers, party of thirteen.

While Stewart's voice may transmit louder waves, he doesn't necessarily make more noise than Martin. Both writers/comedians express powerful ideas in a clear, lucid and elegant manner where life, matter and America are distorted in an intellectually-stimulating fashion. It's comedy for the thinker and the jester and in both cases, all are equally satisfied. If humour were chemistry, they'd be the next Nobel recipients. And if you don't like it...Well, EXCUUUUSE MEEEE!!!

NUMERICAL DETRITUS

The United States Justice Department estimates that 1 in 20 babies born at the present time will serve time in prison at one point in their lives.

According to the California Medical Association, 87 per cent of professional boxers have some form of brain damage.

87 per cent of participants surveyed in 1997 reported that they believed it is "likely" that they will go to heaven.

When a female waiter draws a "happy face" on a bill, her tip rises an average of 18 per cent; the same act performed by a male waiter produces only a 3 per cent increase in gratuity.

The last surviving civil war veteran died in 1959.

On September 26th, 1970, John Kenmiur licked 393 stamps in 4 minutes.

Brazilian novelist Jose Carlos Ryoki de Alpoim Inoue published 1,046 science fiction novels between 1986 and 1996.

The Microsoft Corporation was valued at $224 billion in early 1998, producing an annual revenues of $17.6 billion.

102 is the number of days that the average sixty-year-old male has spent shaving. It is also the number of floors in the Empire State Building in New York City, New York.

40 is the only number-word in the english language in which the letters appear in alphabetical order. Mice DNA contains 40 chromosomes. Ruby is symbolic of a 40th anniversary. The word "quarantine," meaning to segregate for medical reasons, derives from the french word for forty. Forty days was thought to be the appropriate length of time to spend in isolation.

ALICE GETS NO LOVE Munro overlooked for literary prize

By TARA MANSBRIDGE

The Love of a Good Woman
By Alice Munro
Publisher, Price

"Oh, well," said Sophie.
"I survived."
"That's the main thing,"
Eve said shakily.
"Survival."

Open Alice Munro's new collection of short stories, The Love of a Good Woman, to any page. I dare you. Open it, read a phrase, two, maybe three.

It is perhaps overly dramatic to say that each word in the collection trembles with truth. In fact, Munro herself would most likely laugh at the overblown sentiment. But, I dare you, open the book. You'll see what I mean. You'll understand what I'm trying to express in words not well-placed or crafted. I Munro does not speak through her work, the work speaks for itself. And it forces you to listen closely, because The Love of a Good Woman is perhaps the most delicate, beautiful, raw examination of the confluence of life and love by a contemporary author.

Such an exceptional work is no surprise from an author as talented as Alice Munro. Those who follow her work are in no way shocked that the work received the Giller Prize recently. Munro has been hailed, at home and abroad, as one of the most talented short story writers of our time.

Which makes the most recent stupidity committed by the Canada Council for the Arts even more galling. After being hailed as one of the best collections of short stories to be published by a Canadian, The Love of a Good Woman appeared first in The New Yorker rather than in a Canadian literary publication is bad enough. That we passed over these treasures in favour of arguably less meretricious works is unconscionable.

Honestly, I'm not often that interested in the Governor General's Award Nominees until all but one are eliminated. I tend to read whatever I'm interested in, and whatever gets recommended to me as important literature. I have a tendency to soak myself in Canadian authors, much to the chagrin of some of my more literary friends. However, this immersion has brought me to one inevitable conclusion. Canadians at large seem to have no idea what kind of talent our home-grown authors have.

That Munro and her exquisitely written collection have been overlooked simply confirms the fact that we are ignorant of our own literary excellence. It is time that we started to recognize the excellence of our writers before the international community does it for us. The fact that most of the stories collected in The Love of a Good Woman appeared rather than in a Canadian literary publication is bad enough. That we passed over these treasures in favour of arguably less meretricious works is unconscionable.

THE QJR LITERARY CHALLENGE No. 1

Spider Robinson, one of Canada's best-known science fiction writers, currently pens a periodic social commentary column for The Globe and Mail. Robinson calls this column "The Crazy Years." He took this name from the chronological entry, referring to the 1990s, contained in the 1941 "Future History" schema of a science fiction writer Robinson often speaks of as his "mentor." Robinson's hero was arguable the best and most influential American sf writer in the forties, fifties and early sixties, although his novels from the mid-sixties onward are mostly interminable libertarian monologues. Since his death (b. 1907, d. 1988), two of his major novels from the fifties have been made into Hollywood movies. Name him.

Please forward all responses to:

NO BULL

The hidden language of hangovers, grief, insecurity and despair

BY AMY MCCARTHY

After toiling through the first hundred pages or so of Bull, Mark Sinnett's recently published debut collection of short stories, I admit I felt the overwhelming temptation to write a scathing satire on the book, fully aware that this would be rash, unfair, poor form, and would definitely constitute burning bridges.

But, to indulge myself just a little...mine would have been a short story peppered with adjectives, expletives and slang, featuring a repressed, cowardly, self-deprecating young man — let's call him Paul Thetwick — and his struggle against his secret feelings of loathing towards his spinny, domineering, sexually manipulative better half — let's call her Bridgette Ritchie...

Are you catching my drift? Or maybe I should just give you my impression straight up. No bull, so to speak.

Truth be told, Sinnett is a gifted writer in need of a conscientious editor. Despite an often painful overuse of simile, some forced dialogue, the occasional underdeveloped character, and the uniform blandness of his male-female love relationships, there is hope for Sinnett's growth as a story writer.

Sinnett's ability to create and sustain tone, along with his well-chosen symbolism, are promising signs that his short fiction will come to leave a lasting impression in the minds of his readers once the growing pains are overcome.

This writer cannot be accused of not knowing his subject. Sinnett writes the city remarkably well, displaying a talent for sizing things up will undoubtedly prove to be his greatest asset as a writer of urban fiction.

A realist to the core, Sinnett depicts city dwellers with all of their detachment, quirks and fears, blowing the tiniest grains of private experience wildly into proportion — perhaps too much so for the average escapist. His characters, whom he never lets off the hook, reveal in their smallest gestures the hidden language of hangovers, grief, insecurity and despair.

And, as you might have guessed, these hangovers are born from nights spent partying at The Toucan (thinly disguised as "The Parrot"). It is not difficult for Kingston readers to sniff out the limestone in Sinnett's blood; Sinnett uses our city as the backdrop for many of his stories. And a word to the wise — recovering alcoholics beware! Bull is so booze-soaked that it practically floats.

Sinnett pulls no punches when it comes to depicting the truth about Kingston with all of its culture-clash; its overlapping layers of pretension, character and poverty. By introducing us to characters like Helen, a restless prima-donna living above a Cambodian restaurant in the north end of the Kingston, he re-sensitizes us to the juxtapositions that make up the acid-jazz texture of our city.

In spite of my initial instincts, I have to say that Bull is a worthwhile read. The inspired moments (barely) overshadow the forgettable ones, and Sinnett's terse style occasionally flirts with greatness.

HOME IS WHERE THE HEART BREAKS

Celebrated poet's first short story collection soothing, intense

BY AMY MCCARTHY

"Love makes life no easier." Simply put, this is the thematic string which weaves together the thirteen stories in Flesh And Blood, Michael Crummey's first collection of short fiction.

With a tone that is at once both melancholy and sentimental, Crummey unearths the buried emotions of the inhabitants of Black Rock, a small mining community in Newfoundland where unspoken resentment, complicated love and family ties run as deep as the glittering ore itself.

This award-winning Kingston poet possesses the rare gift of insight into the hearts of both genders, unravelling their common experience of suffering. There is Sandy Wilcox, wracked with unwelcome memories of an infant son long buried; jealousy drives young Peg to hatred of her brother, married to the woman she loves; Ted waits patiently for a frustrated girl who is connected to him only by fate.

Much more than a sentimental writer, Crummey bites into the meat and potatoes of life on The Rock, his native soil. He claims the importance of storytelling, nostalgia and neighbourly virtue in the life of Newfoundlanders, at the same time working into his stories detailed histories of the ore mines and the first Chinese settlements on the East Coast.

More than anything, Flesh And Blood reminds one of the impossibility of ever really leaving home. This book is the type to be consumed in a single sitting, with a glass of warm red wine — both by turns soothing and intense.

A graduate of Queen's University, Amy McCarthy is a member of Quarry's editorial board. Her writing has recently appeared in both Kingston This Week and The Kingston Whig-Standard.

New and Notable

COMPILED BY J.C. BELLINGER

Childhood, by André Alexis

McClelland and Stewart, $19.99

Alexis's visceral and poignant voice permeates this moving recollection of the protagonist's youth. Where Alexis's previous publication, a collection of short stories entitled Despair was remarkable for its clarity, here the author reveals an emotionally resonant and mature voice so rarely found in debut novels.

Bitch, by Elizabeth Wurtzel

Doubleday, $32.95

The celebrated, chastised and controversial Wurtzel is not making any new fans with her latest effort. Granted, there were inevitable difficulties to be expected in following up the phenomenal success of her previous work, the post-feminist memoir Prozac Nation. Still, Bitch offers few insights that have not been sufficiently explored elsewhere.

Queer 13: Lesbian and Gay Writers Recall Seventh Grade, edited by Clifford Chase

Weisbach Morrow, $32

A brilliant and long-overdue idea well executed. This collection of memoirs captures the awkwardness and thrill of adolescence with refreshing glee and sometimes powerful sadness. The well-crafted stories oscillate from comedic to painful in an unpredictable but effective manner.

GREETINGS FROM KINGSTON

Thinking of moving? Find out what the tour guides think

BY LIZ FROGLEY

In an effort to discern the characters of the many guides available to travellers, a comparative study was done of what six of the major travel guides had to say about Kingston. Here are the shocking and uncensored results:

Lonely planet

According to the good people at Lonely Planet, Kingston is a handsome city known across the country for its several prisons, and includes a nice little motel for travellers called The Plaza. Apparently they are trying to keep tourists away from Kingston. The Lonely Planet probably should have checked out one of the other travel guides to find a more complete hotel listing.

Other than that little slip, this is a fine guide. The book provides little history of Kingston, but has a comprehensive listing of Kingston's attractions and some interesting facts. If not for the Lonely Planet, I never would have known that the RMC Museum holds the small arms collection of General Porfirio Diaz, Mexican president circa 1900.

This is one of the few guides that offers information on Kingston's nightlife, theatres, and camping, all of which are of particular interest to student travellers. Despite the very real risk of staying in a strip club, this is a fine guide to the city.

Ulysses

Full points for aesthetic value — easy to read layout, nice maps and illustrations and even some pretty colour pictures. The Ulysses dares to be "the most cultural how-to travel guide." It rates Kingston as a two-star town (on a scale of zero to three), meaning "worth a visit." Brief descriptions of museums and other cultural attractions are included, including the International Hockey Hall of Fame at the corner of York and Alfred (of which I had never heard tell of before, but is apparently highly recommended for all hockey fans).

Unfortunately, Ulysses offers almost no practical information for travellers. There is nothing on where to eat or stay, and the telephone numbers of bus and train stations constitute the entire travel section. It does not even include information on theatres, which I think is part of a cultural travel guide's mandate. And — oh, the horror — the review of Kingston is concluded without a single mention of Queen's University. Apparently, we are not cultural enough for Ulysses.

Michelin

The book is an awkward shape and keeps flipping shut when you look anything up. This might not seem like a big deal, but becomes enormously frustrating if you are trying to find information. Also, the maps are not as easy to read as in the Ulysses and, although there are some colour photos, the graphics are generally not as pleasing. So, for purely superficial reasons, I immediately disliked this book.

As for the information actually found in the book, it's not great either. There was nothing on where to stay or eat, and the descriptions of places to go do not include addresses.

Kingston once again received two of a possible three stars ("worth a detour"). The city history is briefer than in other guides, but as the whole book is shorter it follows that there will be less information.

To sum up: this book is ugly and didn't tell me anything new. Into the fireplace with Michelin!

Fodor's

Fodor's doesn't mention Queen's either, or the prisons. How anyone can describe Kingston without mentioning any of its fine institutions is beyond me. At least Lonely Planet mentioned the university, although they also told you to stay at a strip club.

But back to Fodor's. It's easy to read but lacks the graphics and maps that made the other guides so much fun. For some bizarre reason, the only thing listed under "Lodging" is the Hochelaga. This was obviously not designed for student budgets. There's a very nice map of Canada included in the book, but even the map's pretty colours cannot compensate for the lack of information.

Rough Guide

This begins with a brief-but-informative history of Kingston. There's also a nice map of the city and a description of Queen's, particularly the Agnes and the Museum of Geology and Mineralogy. The Museum is apparently has a lovely collection of fossils, rocks, minerals, and dinosaurs. The accommodation listing offers brief descriptions and helpful price ranges. There's also a fairly long listing of restaurants and bars in Kingston, although some of the listings are out of date (i.e. the Ghetto House Caf no longer exists).

This is probably the best guidebook for students, as it lists cheaper accommodation and restaurants, and offers descriptions of the bars. The only major omission is theatres — nary a mention of any of them.

Frommer's

Although the lovely cover of this guidebook promises whale watching, wildlife, ski resorts, Inuit art, etc., none of these things are included in the description of Kingston. More importantly, the wealth of information promised by this list does not materialize. This gives the reader good descriptions of a few of Kingston's attractions, and has a brief accommodation and restaurant listing. Overall, however, it is uninspiring.

The most interesting thing about these books is the shocking fact that Fodor's and Ulysses don't mention Queen's. I think every student, staff member and faculty member should take this as a personal insult. On a related note, every inmate in Kingston should take the omission of the prisons as an insult... which reminds me, only two of the books mentioned the fine correctional services museum over by West Campus. For shame! But anyway, I hope Principal Leggett will personally complain to the publishers of each of these guidebooks for their blasphemous neglect of Queen's.

Although each of these books had its flaws, the Rough Guide and Lonely Planet are the clear winners. They contain the most information, and offer a variety of things to do. The best place to get information about Kingston is still the Tourist Information Centre, so if you are really interested in getting to know the city, just drop by 209 Ontario St.

Liz Frogley is still very bitter after having inadvertently stayed at The Plaza during her first visit to Kingston.

KINGSTON BY THE NUMBERS

Number of mentions (of a possible six)

Queen's University: 4
Fort Henry: 6
Chez Piggy: 3
Cocamo's: 2 (but one as "The Cocama")
Any penitentiary: 2
RMC: 6
Bryan Adams: 1
Int'l Ice Hockey Federation Museum: 4
The Plaza: 1

ESSENTIAL KINGSTON

Visit St. George's Church, which contains a fine Tiffany window (whatever that is). For the more adventurous, you can hike the Rideau Trail, which runs for 388 kilometres along the canal from Kingston to Ottawa.

— Frommer's

Drop by the Kingston Archaeological Centre at 270 King St. West, which chronicles 8000 years human history in the Kingston area

— Lonely Planet

Take the Governor's Canoe, a replica voyageur's canoe that explores the islands, leaving from the marina (but only from May-September). During the rest of the year, try the Correctional Services of Canada Museum at 555 King St. West, which "dwells on the penitentiary's darker days."

— Rough Guide

The Marine Museum of the Great Lakes can be found at an undisclosed location near the lake. Displays on construction methods and Kingston's shipbuilding past.

— Michelin

Bellevue House, the former residence of Sir John A., is conveniently located at 35 Centre St., and is furnished in chic 1848 style.

— Fodor's

Did you know that Martello towers were invented by a guy named Martello? This is only one of the many fun facts you can learn by going to the Murney Tower Museum, in the Martello tower at the foot of Barrie St.

Grad students denied Who's Where

BY MAGGIE BUHAJCZYK

For the first time, graduate and law students will not receive free copies of the Who's Where this year. In response, the Society of Graduate and Professional Students has decided to withhold certain payments to the Alma Mater Society.

"It is our position that if the AMS is going to withhold services to our members, then we have no choice but to withhold the ancillary fees that are covered under the service agreement," stated Chris Hales, president of the SGPS, in an open letter to AMS President Tom Stanley and members of AMS and SGPS.

The fees will be kept in trust until a resolution is reached between the two societies, Hales stated in the letter. The fees being held are normally directed to services including Bus-it, Walkhome and the Tricolour Yearbook.

"We were not aware that we could no longer receive the Who's Where because when the grad students separated they had a service agreement," said Hales. According to Hales, the 1993 agreement, which gave the SGPS access to all self-sufficient AMS services, is no longer being recognized by the AMS.

"It was all very last minute. We found out on Friday, October 23," that members of the SGPS would not be receiving copies of the Who's Where, he said, "and the Who's Where was distributed on Monday, October 26."

Death saddens history department

BY FIANA STEVENSON

The department of history, Queen's University and the Kingston community are mourning the loss of long-time Queen's professor Donald Swainson. Mr. Swainson, who died last Friday, became ill over the summer and was unable to teach courses this term. He was 59.

"He was very well-liked by his students and especially appreciated by his fourth-year seminar students," said Paul Christianson, chair of the history department. "He had a very good wit which sometimes was understated and he would often precede a witty remark by looking over the top of his glasses."

"He was very well-liked by his students and especially appreciated by his fourth-year seminar students."

— Paul Christianson, chair of the history department

Mr. Swainson started teaching at Queen's in 1963. He specialized in 19th and 20th century Canadian political history.

He was the chair of graduate studies in history on four separate occasions between 1970 and 1982 and was chair of the humanities division of the School of Graduate Studies and Research from 1978-80.

Mr. Swainson also taught a variety of courses, including a Canadian history survey course, 19th and 20th century Canadian political history courses, and seminars on western-Canadian history and old Ontario. In addition, he supervised a number of masters and doctorate theses and various undergraduate independent study projects.

Activists march past the market in downtown Kingston Saturday afternoon, protesting hate crimes against queers and the lack of media coverage on queer issues.

Queer rights activists break silence

BY LAURA MACINNIS

"Silence is violence."

This message resonated through Kingston's market square last weekend as activists rallied together to protest hate crimes against gays and lesbians and the lack of media coverage on queer issues.

Approximately 70 students gathered at the Kingston market on Saturday, wearing rainbow ribbons and holding signs stating "Silence is death, action is life."

The group congregated outside City Hall for approximately half an hour before marching up Princess Street, chanting: "Queer community under attack. What do we do? Act up, fight back!"

"A death in Wyoming, a riot in New York... We are here to break the silence. We are here to make some noise," said Jason Silzer, Sci '99.

On October 12, Wyoming student

Matthew Shepard was brutally murdered by two men because he was gay. Five days later, queer activists in New York planned a political funeral for Shepard. Thousand of supporters attended the vigil.

Mourners at the vigil claim they were beaten and mistreated by members of the New York Police Department. More than 130 people were arrested without access to lawyers, and AIDS patients were detained without access to their medication.

The New York beating did not appear in the mainstream media, which prompted members of the Kingston community to rally to bring queer-bashing into focus.

"Someone died for being who they were. That's just not fair," said Azin Morad Hasse, Arts '02. "I'm here because I'm afraid... I'm not used to being afraid."

Protest organizer Jocelyn Heisel, Arts '99, read a poem she had composed to the group. "My voice has muscles that ripple through shirt sleeves. My voice laughs out loud. My voice will not be silenced," she said, adding, "The power is ours, and we can do with it whatever we choose."

Students encouraged to winterize homes

BY FIONA SCANNELL

With temperatures starting to drop, many on-campus groups suggest students winterize their homes immediately in order to significantly reduce heating bills.

"There are a lot of devastated students who don't realize what their utilities will cost until they see their bills," said Ken Mundell of the Energy Sales department at Kingston Utilities. Mundell estimated that 20 to 40 per cent of heat is lost through air leakage.

Recognizing this fact, for $20, OPIRG's Housewarming Project, located in the Earth Centre at the JDUC, aims to allow "tenants and homeowners to ease winter chills and save some money by implementing energy conservation techniques," according to Richard Feldman, director of the Housewarming Project.

These techniques include using plastic to cover drafty windows; insulating hot water pipes, electrical outlets and switches; caulking the windows that are not covered with plastic and testing for shower energy efficiency.

The winterizing project is staffed by volunteers, and receives on-campus funding from the Town Gown Office and the AMS Municipal Affairs Commission, and support from various environmental and social justice-oriented groups, including OPIRG.

The Housewarming Project has been well-received over the past four years, said Feldman. Demand for the service is greater than volunteers can keep up with, he added.

Alison Gee, Arts '99, said the costs involved with the project were not of great benefit to her house. While Gee acknowledged that the program made her household aware of where they could reduce heat loss, she said the winterizing attempts of her and her housemates were more successful than those of the volunteers.

"The Housewarming is great if you only have three windows in your house," Gee said. "After the Housewarmers left we had to go out and buy another $20 worth of material."

The Housewarming costs only for two to three windows, she explained.

OPIRG's Housewarmers use mylar, rather than heat-sensitive, plastic. Mylar plastic is thick, does not tear easily, and can be reused in subsequent years, explained Feldman.

Rector candidates discuss student issues

BY SHAWN BRIMLEY

MIKE KEALY feels that his long experience at Queen's gives him the perspective needed to be an effective Rector.

A Sudbury native who came to Queen's in 1994 as a life science major, Kealy ended up graduating with Bachelor degrees in both biology and history. Now a first-year law student, Kealy said he wants to translate his experiences into a positive source of information and understanding for the student population.

"I feel qualified to provide guidance for Queen's students in every respect," said Kealy. "My diverse education has afforded me the opportunity to gain a broad perspective on the variety of issues that materialize at Queen's."

Kealy said he feels accessibility to the Rector is a key concern. If elected, Kealy wants to create a homepage to allow students an accessible way to voice their concerns.

"This homepage would also provide an update to students on how the university is being run and why certain decisions are being made at the administrative level," Kealy said.

He also plans, if elected, to provide to students with a brief synopsis of the financial situation of the university. "A three to four page summary could be distributed to students via The Journal or the web, to show [students] how their money is being spent," Kealy suggested.

Kealy said he wants to ensure that the administration examines every source of revenue before going to the students in the form of tuition hikes.

"[Having a Rector] is an incredible opportunity for students to have their voices heard," said Kealy. "As Rector, [I would] have the opportunity to be involved in the search for additional sources of capital from the private and public sector."

Kealy said his years at Queen's have allowed him to develop the proper perspective to speak with confidence on the concern of the students. "I guarantee that I will provide a responsible voice in regard to how our University is run," he said. "[I] will strive to balance the need for accessible education and the maintenance of quality for which Queen's is known the world over."

JIM QUINN said he believes communication is the most effective catalyst for change. If elected Rector, Quinn promises to communicate the wishes of students to the administration.

Quinn, a third-year nursing student, attended Carleton for two years and then worked for two years before coming back to school. "Working for two years really gave me the motivation to go back to school," Quinn said.

"A person is elected to the position of Rector, but the position belongs to every Queen's student," said Quinn. "The students need an interactive Rector."

If elected, Quinn plans to emphasize the concerns of students to the decision making bodies at Queen's. "I want to advocate any and all issues my fellow students have," Quinn said. "[The Rector] is a communicating point. You can't force an issue, but you can facilitate it being addressed."

To increase accessibility to the Rector and the administration, Quinn said as Rector he would provide up to date information on his work by submitting a regular column to The Journal, and by creating an e-mail listserv.

"Students generally know what they want, but their opinions don't seem to be getting to the people that it should," said Quinn. "Since you are a Queen's student, you should be able to address your concerns to the executive levels, even in the smallest way."

Quinn is also very interested in developing a student-alumni mentorship program, which would link students with a willing alumni in their chosen field of study or work.

"I have encountered Queen's Alumni both on campus and in different cities who express interest in maintaining links to their Alma Mater," said Quinn. "[I have] talked to many students wishing for an avenue to become involved and knowledgeable about their chosen profession. It is my belief that student alumni mentorship would perfectly fit into this role."

Quinn said, "The situation of every student here at Queen's is unique and includes all individual aspects of life here for every student... I am here to listen."

Human rights discussed

BY BARBARA HARVEY

Approximately 75 people came to hear a speech by Chief Commissioner Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay of the Canadian Human Rights Commission Friday evening, as part of the Human Rights symposium series.

As Falardeau-Ramsay was unable to attend, her speech was presented by Commissioner Phyllis Gordon in the Robert Sutherland Room in the John Deutsch University Centre.

The lecture, entitled "Human Rights in the 21st Century," was composed in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as well as the 20th anniversary of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

The Chief Commissioner's transcript detailed some of the history of human rights. "I think it is important to know where we came from in order to consider where we are going," wrote Falardeau-Ramsay, adding "as Nelhe McClung put it: people must know the past to understand the present and face the future."

A variety of advancements made in the field of human rights were discussed. Falardeau-Ramsay's speech addressed topics such as the Congress of Vienna, the League of Nations and the establishment of the United Nations, remarking that Canada has made impressive progress in the struggle to protect basic rights. However, she also emphasized that there is much work to be done.

According to the Chief Commissioner, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights remains "a vision of the world as we would like it to be." Citing examples such as the oppression of women in Iran and the ethnic strife of the former Yugoslavia, she illustrated current infringements of human rights in the international community. Falardeau-Ramsay used these examples to warn against assuming Canada is a utopia of equality.

The Chief Commissioner's speech also pointed to unfounded assumptions about current practices. "Many of the human rights we now take for granted have been in place for one generation or less," she said. She noted that, by law, discrimination based on gender, sex, age, sexuality, disability, and race is strictly prohibited and yet ordinary Canadians are confronted with flagrant violations of this provision every day.

Commissioner Phyllis Gordon

On Saturday evening, Alfred Bader, the alumni responsible for donating Herstoncourt Castle to Queen's, delivered a lecture entitled "Paintings we hope will come to Queen's" at the Interim Agnes to an audience of about 70 people. As part of the Speaking about Art lecture series, Bader discussed approximately 50 paintings he has collected that he wants to donate to Queen's. He divided the paintings into four categories: puzzle paintings, biblical subjects, Rembrandt and his circle, and paintings he couldn't resist.

Professor was actively involved in community

"[Mr. Swainson's HIST 270] was one of the most popular courses in the department," Christianson said. "It was one that had a lot of student interest."

Mr. Swainson was born in Baldur, Manitoba on November 23, 1938. He earned a Bachelor of Arts degree at the University of Manitoba and completed a Master of Arts and a PhD at the University of Toronto.

The professor was also an accomplished writer who published numerous books including a biography of John A. Macdonald and a history of Kingston, which he produced jointly with Brian Osborne from the Queen's department of geography.

Mr. Swainson moved to Kingston in 1963 and became actively involved in the community. He was a longtime member of the Kingston Historical Association and "was also very active in covering political events for The Kingston Whig-Standard," said Christianson.

Swainson is survived by his wife Eleanor, his two sons Erik and Andrew, and his two grandchildren Melissa and Andrew. A funeral service will take place today at the James Reid Funeral Home, Catarqui Chapel. Memorial donations can be made to the Donald Swainson Memorial Bursary Fund, Queen's University.

Speaker discusses labour markets Rally active

By KATHERINE WALLER

Last Thursday, Paula B. Voos, a professor at Rutgers University in New Jersey, appeared at Queen's University to discuss the current global marketplace and its effect on unions.

Voos was invited to Queen's as part of the Don Wood Lecture Series, an annual event held to honour the founder of the Master of Industrial Relations program at Queen's.

An active public figure in industrial relations research, Voos received her PhD in Economics at Harvard before becoming a professor at Rutgers University's School of Management and Labour Relations.

She argued that a "laissez faire" economic philosophy has dominated public policy in the United States and Canada during the last several years, one that calls for smaller governments, low taxes, privatization and deregulation of labour markets. These changes, advocated in the name of increasing competition and bolstering the economy, have led to a decrease in wages and workers' benefits such as unemployment and disability insurance, she said.

A widening gap in income levels is a trend that has been progressing since 1973. Studies indicate that the gap has very recently become less pronounced in the US, but Voos attributed this to the current strength of the global economy, rather than the inherent merit of the "laissez faire" mentality. "Recessions do come," she said, and, when they do, legal and social structures are needed to manage the mess.

A growing backlash to the unbridled "laissez faire" approach has given rise to "The Third Way," a belief that one can be both pro-market and pro-government at the same time.

As described by Voos, "The Third Way" attempts to keep unemployment down through world-wide decreases in interest rates, coupled with careful government spending on investments in transportation, education and training services. It also recognizes the benefits of collective bargaining in the workplace, she explained.

Voos briefly highlighted the advantages of unions. By helping to create and protect employment standards for workers, she said, unions actually reduce the need for excessive government intervention in the workplace. The business can be run more efficiently when the employer is able to deal with a single union speaking for a large number of employees, Voos explained, rather than having to deal with each employee individually.

Unionization rates have regressed to 10 per cent and have not been this low since the 1930s, Voos said. This is also happening to a lesser extent in Canada, she added. Voos identified several reasons for this decrease. First, the low cost, low skill, low commitment approach to employment intrinsic in the "laissez faire" mentality discourages employers from having a positive attitude towards unions and, in many cases, leads to resistance through intimidation tactics and legal action.

Second, Voos argued that the frequent closure of plants and opening of new ones makes unionization difficult.

A third problem, Voos continued, was the lack of effective attempts by unions to provide services and market themselves to people of all professions, particularly the more "artsy" ones. In the United States, unions have been trying to involve youth in the labour movement and provide training for non-unionized and unionized workers alike to educate them on collective bargaining and other union functions, she explained.

So far, Voos said the outcome hasn't been very encouraging. "They have not found a way yet to reinvent themselves," she said.

Those speaking in front of the group emphasized the need for gays and lesbians to be vocal and to work together, and expressed disappointment with the rally's turnout.

"Where are our friends, where are the other people we know?" asked Ryan O'Connor, Con-Ed '00. "We all have to stand up and fight for our rights."

McKay Savage, vice-president (student development) of the Engineering Society, said he was content with the rally's turnout, but emphasized the need for more action by those who desire change. "I just don't understand it when people say they're too busy," he said. "If not now, when? If not us, who are we counting on to pick up the slack?"

A Queer Action Group has been formed at Queen's to address concerns about queer issues on campus and in Kingston. The group's first meeting takes place tomorrow at 4 p.m. at the OPIRG office (Earth centre) in the JDUC.

Tenants, be aware

Extra plastic can be requested from the Housewarmers at a cost of $1.10 per foot, said Feldman.

Before student tenants embark upon their own winterizing adventures, Patrick McNeill, Town Gown Relations, suggested speaking to one's landlord. "With a lot of the student homes being over 50 years old, it is a good idea to see what the landlord wants done," McNeill explained, noting that winterizing merely involves sealing the places where heat is lost.

Sarah Corman, AMS municipal affairs commissioner, said the lack of a requirement for insulation in rental properties under the Kingston Landlord-Tenant Act is a "big problem." While landlords are required to have heating systems fully functional by September 15, the expenses involved with insulating older homes prevents extensive upgrading from becoming law, she explained.

Landlords are only responsible for replacing drafty doors and windows if such requests are included in the lease, Corman said. She suggested students phone Kingston Utilities to get the high and low prices for a particular house before signing the lease.

Grad students 'surprised'

According to Hales, on October 23, the SGPS received an e-mail from the WW/WN Publications informing him that "in order for the [SGPS] students to receive a copy of the Who's Where a... donation of $2.00/SGPS member" would be required.

Stanley said he regrets the late notice. "We were not plotting this in May. The only thing that I have asserted throughout the entire process of law students' separation is that things were going to arise that no one would foresee," he said. According to Stanley, the 1993 agreement had a condition that it terminated September 1, 1996.

"Since we've been paying for services like The Journal and Walkhome, we feel the '93 agreement is binding until the new, 1996 agreement is signed," Hales said.

"I think it's unteasonable to rely on incomplete and half negotiated draft documents to extract action," Stanley said. "Even under the conditions of the 1996 draft agreement, the SGPS would still not receive the Who's Where."

"Grad students got it in the past mostly because by the time [the AMS] could get around to looking at distribution it was too late, the books had already been given out," explained Who's Where Editor Mike Beltzner. "When you're working against a deadline, distribution tends to slip through the cracks," he added.

This year the AMS and Who's Where editors looked at the issue in advance and found "there was no reason for the grad students to get the Who's Where for free," said Beltzner. "Most other external organizations aren't allowed a copy of the book. They have to realize if they don't pay AMS fees they won't get the same services."

"A lot of students were surprised," by the AMS decision, Hales said. "The professional, law and graduate students released their private and personal information on the understanding that it would be distributed to all students, including themselves," he explained.

"It seems pointless to put us in the Who's Where without actually giving it to us," said Meaghan Hands, Law '01.

Hales attributed the rejection of the agreement to AMS financial problems. "The Who's Where is losing money and this is a way to make it up," he stipulated.

"Advertising was sold on the basis that the Who's Where was distributed to all Queen's students," he added.

Beltzner stated that although the Who's Where does get most of its funding from advertising, it still relies on the AMS to back any lost revenue. "The AMS still assumes a portion of the risk by bailing us out," he said.

The AMS is also planning to make the Who's Where available at the Campus Bookstore at a reduced rate of $8.99.

"We don't think it's unreasonable that people pay for the services they receive," said Stanley. "We have more important things on our agenda to pursue. I don't want to waste students' time with this bickering," he added.

Outstanding Contributors: October

MCCORMICK

TARYN

Taryn McCormick, co-chair of the ASUS Women's Empowerment Committee, is one of The Journal's contributors for the month of October. Her two articles, one a powerful, cutting edge and well-researched feature informing of the atrocities currently being inflicted upon members of the queer community and the other, a strong opinion piece "We haven't come that far, baby," were lucid, well-written and immensely popular. Thanks Taryn!

WHITTINGTON

JIM

Not only is Jim Whittington kind to animals, but he can also write a heck of a CD review. Jim has become one of A&E's most tireless and reliable contributors, writing countless reviews and conducting an intriguing interview with swing and bluesman Colin James.

SAMSON

As one of the most productive photography contributors, Samson has been both readily available and reliable, two valuable attributes for a Journal contributor. Samson has also shown a lot of creativity in his work which has progressively improved. His cheery demeanour and eagerness to contribute make him a logical choice for contributor of the month.

The Post disappoints

MAKING ITS DEBUT LAST WEEK, the National Post landed on doorsteps across the country with a lighter than expected thud: where was the sports, the national news or the promised 'progressive' comic strips?

On the other hand, the business coverage delivered even more than was expected. In fact, it seems as if Editor Ken Whyte has wrapped a thin veneer of news and commentary around a substantial business section headlined by the Financial Post. As for the name 'national' — while available everywhere from St. John's to Prince Rupert's Island, the new paper's focus is on anything that might be relevant to Torontonians.

Unfortunately, this distinctly regional flavour and devotion to business are criticisms that could also be levelled at other newspapers. The Post diverges from its competitors, however, when its conservative ideological tone comes across too strongly in headlines and stories, thus clouding the appearance of objectivity.

As for the physical appearance of the paper itself, it is difficult to tell if the Post is trying to emulate the Wall Street Journal or U.S.A. Today. The narrow columns and unappealing typeface present a challenge to even the most myopic readers. The front-page cut-outs of famous Canadians are also hard to miss. With no disrespect to such icons of Canadian culture as Alanis Morissette and Wayne Gretzky, these graphics are best left off the front page of the newspaper.

These numerous problems with layout and content aside, the new paper is definitely a welcome player in the field of Canadian journalism. Every new voice, no matter how obscure, only adds to the diversity of opinions and coverage of news in Canada, not to mention job opportunities.

It is unfortunate, therefore, that one of the major players in the newspaper industry, Torstar, has reacted to the new paper by trying to acquire another major player — the Sun Media group. If worried about the new paper taking readers away, the newspaper industry would be wise to follow the lead of the Globe and Mail and concentrate on improving themselves before they buy the competition.

Reviewing feminism

WHILE IT WOULD INDEED BE a shame if even one woman declined to submit to the Review because a male was on the editorial board, it would be a greater travesty if such fears undermined the mandate of the publication itself. If the Review really expects to be a "forum for feminist voices from a variety of backgrounds and experiences," its staff must recognize that even a male's perspective can be a legitimate voice. It seems very backwards for a publication that last year boasted of being forward-thinking, to assume that someone's gender prevents them from making an equally valuable contribution to the Review.

There is an inherent contradiction in the Review's own mission statement of "embracing feminism in its many forms" excludes the participation of a male in its editorial board. By hesitating to accept a male as a legitimate member of the board, the Review has probably discouraged many males from submitting to the publication. This is unfortunate because feminist writing and art at Queen's could only benefit from having a multitude of views represented in the Review.

The members of the committee that was unable to come to consensus over this issue should realize that they could have harmed the credibility of the publication. It should not have taken the intervention of the AMS Social Issues Commissioner to ensure that the Feminist Review adheres to the AMS policy of equality.

We can only hope that in the future, when a male shows a genuine interest in participating in the celebration of women's lives and experiences, his gender will not be an issue.

The sickness within

"DID YOU HEAR THAT JOHN IS SICK?" MY PARENTS DROPPED THIS bombshell on me on the way back from the Halifax airport. John has been my best friend since junior high school. I hadn't heard from him in a while, but I figured it was just the geography, the stress of academia, the hectic term that had distanced us.

Openness about medication like Prozac has helped legitimize mental disorders as a physical illnesses. But how much do we really know about the effects of neurological treatment? Mood regulating drugs can have unpredictable effects. They can help lift the veil of sickness and let sufferers feel capable, comfortable and alive. They can also make life bland, boring, foreign and incredibly lonely.

But we feel uncomfortable with the changes we see in friends. We don't know what to say or do, we don't know how to react. And we often do nothing.

We need to be honest about the social stigma we attribute to mental disorders. We need to appreciate that the rejection and shame sufferers tend to compounds the problem and alienate those who need empathy and support.

I have learned a lot from John. I have seen his friends shirk away, I have felt just as uncomfortable as others in finding ways to talk about his experience and to support him.

It's difficult to generalize a condition that affects each individual differently, and it's hard to know how to approach issues that we aren't talking about.

Let's recognize that mental disorders are physical ailments, no different from other sicknesses. It's time to discard our assumptions about mental illness and reach out in support to our friends in need.

Why the difference?
 We hear of a diagnosis of mental illness and think, "he's crazy," "she's not herself." There is a puzzling tendency to blame sufferers of mental illness for being weak, to tell them to "cheer up" or stop feeling sorry for themselves.

OPINIONS

Racism within us, around us

ON MONDAY OCTOBER 19, some approved posters for OPIRG's Free Burma! working group were put up in the Biosciences complex. These depicted Aung San Suu Kyi, Nobel Peace Prize recipient and leader of the struggle for democracy in Burma, whose visage is unmistakably Asian.

By that evening, the posters had been singled out and removed. New posters were put up. By the next morning they too were gone (and not for lack of billboard space). New posters were put up. This cycle continued. Eight generations of posters have seen the light of day.

Here's another anecdote from the Queen's University Wide World of Racism. Upon a recent trip to one of Stauffer Library's gleaming stalls I noticed the following endearing love note, painstakingly etched into the wall: "Chinks, go home." My, how little Johnny's literary talents have blossomed since he's been away at university!

Both of these stories speak to the existence of pervasive systemic racism in the Queen's community. These attitudes are typically born of a stubborn refusal on the part of students to accept differences between cultures, preferring instead the path of enlightenment signed "This way please to ethnocentrism."

In the near absence of minority groups, racism on a personal level can be more scarce than one might think. Though the dominant group in such a situation can often be heard slinging racist comments amongst themselves, they rarely (as I have observed, being raised on the East Coast) follow through with personal attacks on minority representation.

The reason for this is simple. Suppose you live in a rown with a thousand of your closest (similarly hued) friends, and a family of four with whom you share no chromatic bond. Feeling threatened yet? Nor bloody likely. People rarely act on racist impulses until they can envision serious potential for change in their surroundings due to the presence of minority groups.

At Queen's the majority group in terms of both numbers and clout is undoubtedly white, but the demographic landscape is changing. With this shift away from homogeneity in our community, I have observed the inevitable rise of white on anything-but-white racism.

As such, the reverse racism parry smacks of hollow academia, proving a bit weak as an excuse when one considers cri-

Signed: ??

Dear Editors,
 Two weeks ago I was approached by a friend to sign a petition (letter) of what seemed to be of importance to him. I believe that if someone feels strongly enough about a particular issue, and can convince me that it is an important topic of conversation, that it is my privilege to be able to support them by signing.

Last week after the printing of The Journal, I received a call from my sister asking me about the article 'I wrote' in the paper. To start, I had no idea what she was talking about, until she prompted me with some political information about the OUSA referendum. It occurred to me then, that someone had published an article under my name, dealing with a political topic of which my friend had asked for support. To my irritation, I had numerous other 'comments' that day about 'my article,' all from people arguing an opinion that is not my own.

Letters to the Editors

you (the author) feels that strongly about something that you should sign your name to your work, or if you are uncomfortable, leave it anonymous. Signing my name was irritating for me, and embarrassing for you — I have no respect for your work.

I have learned a valuable lesson from all of this... now that I'm 20, I need to start acting like it and think things through before I sign my name to anything of importance. I advise you all to do the same.

Finally, a note to the original author: ironically, sir, your behaviour "is nothing more than a shameful ploy to avoid accountability for [your] action." Whoever you are, I expect an apology.

Attack on OPIRG unfounded

Dear Editors,

I read Robert Walker's letter (The Journal, Oct. 27th) with some surprise. Mr. Walker is completely inaccurate in implying that OPIRG does nothing for the student housing area.

The Housewarming Project, in its fifth year, is an OPIRG working-group dedicated to reducing heat loss in student and community homes. No, we will not bring trash cans to your house, but we will install window plastic, insulation, caulking, etc. The result is a direct improvement in tenants' quality of life: a warmer home, a cheaper energy bill, and a positive impact on our environment.

I agree with Mr. Walker that student houses are poorly maintained by landlords. This is exactly the reason why housewarming exists and why our services are in great demand.

Unfortunately, Walker chose not to contact OPIRG either to verify his impressions or to seek assistance in actuality.

ally acting on his concerns. One of the main purposes of the PIRG is to act as a resource for people who actually want to do something about global and local environmental/social justice issues. Had Mr. Walker taken the time to visit our office in the Earth Centre, his complaint to The Journal might have been accompanied by more concrete plans for action on the subject.

More unsettling than Walker's uninformed assessment of the PIRG's "inaction" are his statements about the city's poor. On this point Mr. Walker travels beyond mere ignorance and into the realm of the offensive. To suggest that welfare recipients are along for a "free ride" and should, therefore, clean up after privileged university students is an insult to both students' ability to keep their own garbage off the streets and the dignity of society's impoverished. Furthermore, his statements echo a Harris-style scapegoating ideology that as we speak is forcing growing number of Ontarians to live below the poverty line.

I welcome Robert Walker to not only enlist OPIRG's support in starting a village clean-up campaign but also to spend time in our resource library researching the issue of poverty in Canada, the ideology behind workfare, and encountering first hand accounts of what it is like to be surviving the hand to mouth existence granted by a welfare check.

Men can be feminists, too

Dear Editors,

Re: "Male Applicant Stirrs Debate at Feminist Review" — I simply don't understand why there was even controversy in the first place. I picked up a flyer for the Feminist Review at clubs night which encouraged both men and women to apply for the editorial board. I thought it was quite progressive of the Review. It would seem that perhaps that statement was made under the assumption that no men would apply and the Review wouldn't have to deal with it.

Jocelyn Heisel's "strong" opposition to hiring a male also surprised me. According to the Review's mission statement, printed on their back cover, "The Queen's Feminist Review is a forum for feminist voices from a variety of backgrounds and experiences. We embrace feminism in its many forms and strive to represent this diversity within our pages."

Men can be feminists, and it's about time we recognize and commend them on joining us in our struggle to fight oppression.

Waterloo's doubts of OUSA should raise eyebrows

Dear Editors,

I found the following item on the University of Waterloo's on-line newspaper which indicates that in June of this year the University of Waterloo Federation of Students downgraded their membership in OUSA from full to associate status.

My questions to the AMS Executive are as follows: a) was the Executive aware of this move b) if so why was Assembly never informed of this pertinent detail in all of the three months of discussion about alignment? and c) if not, why did they not know about this d) what exactly were Waterloo's concerns regarding OUSA and have they been resolved? and e) given the doubts about OUSA expressed by one of its own members isn't the Executives' desire to join OUSA now somewhat premature?

Given the doubts about OUSA expressed by one of its own members isn't the Executives' desire to join OUSA somewhat premature?

Members of the executive have assured me that they did not know about Waterloo's decision and I accept that. I do think, however, that the fact that Waterloo is expressing doubts about OUSA's abilities in communication with members, research and media relations and have decided to downgrade their membership status should make the AMS think twice about whether OUSA is worth joining at all.

The UW Federation of Students has expressed its dissatisfaction with the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance by dropping its membership in the provincial student lobby group from full to associate level. Full membership in OUSA — which UW helped to found just a few years ago — costs the Feds $27,000 per year. Since this is the first time any student group has taken such action, the membership fee must be negotiated, said Feds president Christian Provenzano. "But the most we'll pay is 25 per cent (of the full fee)," he added. "We feel OUSA has the potential to be an effective lobby group. We need provincial representation, and didn't want to pull out completely. If we see productive change by November, we'll pay the balance of the fees." Among the Feds' concerns about OUSA are poor communications with membership, inability to use the media effectively, and failure to produce meaningful documents or results. Andrew Boggs, new OUSA executive director, has vowed to embark on a process of re-evaluation and rebuilding.

Why I voted 'No' IV

Dear Editors,

I am writing in response to a challenge posed by Nina Suri ("Students deserve choice") and Marnie Michalak ("Whose interests are you representing?"). Many students have expressed outrage at AMS Assembly's decision not to place the OUSA alignment question on the fall referendum. I stand by my "no" vote, and I would like to take this opportunity to explain why.

For three months, AMS Assembly had debated the merits of alignment (joining a lobbying group vs. staying the present course of self-representation) and of the relevant organizations (provincial and national lobbying groups). Many factors clouded the alignment issue in the end:

(1) Posing the OUSA question seemed hypocritical. Those who believed the CFS-O was not a valid option felt they could, in good conscience, take that option away from students (it being a well-researched decision). Those who felt similarly about OUSA or about alignment in general were told that they were obstructing the democratic process.

(2) As a result of (1), the question became loaded. Assembly was scrutinizing a very specific question, and many members felt that a vote to place it on the referendum would have shown implicit support for the content of the question.

(3) Regarding student intelligence, I strongly believe that many comments on the ability and right of students to make decisions were taken out of context. Two concerns raised during debate were about the student body, however. First, the alignment debate presented to students in The Journal and elsewhere had been very one-sided, favouring alignment and favouring OUSA. Second, Assembly had had the benefit of three months of extensive debate and documentation, yet many Assembly members remained torn on the issue, largely due to unanswered questions (and yes, for the record, those questions had been asked). Many members felt that it would be unfair to put to students a one-sided, incomplete, and abbreviated version of the debate.

Regarding the secret ballot, I cannot address Ms. Suri's concerns directly because I did not have to agree to it. If a single member requests a single ballot, it is automatically granted. Nonetheless, the secret ballot is not a means for Assembly members to hide behind their vote; rather, I respectfully suggest that some Assembly members recognize it as an opportunity to vote without pressure.

Finally, I have some clarifications to make. Both Ms. Suri and Ms. Michalak make some valid points in their letters. I am disturbed, however, by their repeated references to "appointment" and "acclamation." First, no voting members of Assembly are ever appointed. Second, I was acclaimed. I do not, however, feel any lack of responsibility to the 6,800 students I represent, and I exert no less effort in their interest than I would had I

Cola deals explained

Dear Editors,

In recent months, a number of campus publications have contained articles, editorials and letters to the editor concerning cold beverage exclusivity on the Queen's University campus. I would like to make all members of the Queen's community aware of the process currently being followed as well as provide background information on what is and is not involved in cold beverage exclusivity.

In brief, such arrangements involve granting a single supplier, Coca-Cola or Pepsi, exclusive rights to supply cold beverages (excluding milk) to the campus at both manual and vended outlets. In return, the university receives significant financial benefit.

This is a business arrangement with suppliers, where the university is trying to maximize its revenue. It is not unlike the type of agreements universities have with many other suppliers. The benefits received by both parties are clearly defined in a contract and there is no intention for the bottler to have any role in influencing or shaping teaching programs or research. There are no restrictions on academic freedom as a result of such an agreement.

At this time no discussions are taking place with either bottler. The university is currently in the feasibility stage and has hired Spectrum Marketing to assess the potential benefits and impact of entering this type of contract. This involved discussion with stakeholders and gathering information concerning volumes and pricing. Spectrum has been involved in a number of contracts of this nature across Canada and will be in a position to provide a report in late November.

A steering committee consisting of myself, Bob Crawford (Dean of Student Affairs), Inna van Nostrand (Director of Alumni Affairs), Tom Stanley (AMS President), and Christopher Hales (SGPS President) will review the report with the aim of making a recommendation to senior officers of the university concerning further exploration of cold beverage exclusivity.

I hope that this information is helpful in bringing the community up to date and I will continue to provide updated information throughout the process.

The etiquette of fine dining

Dear editors,

"There is no accounting for tastes," the proverb goes. Indeed, who are we to judge other people's tastes or lack thereof? This general maxim should not, however, apply to culinary critics.

To write and publish a restaurant review is more than exposing what one likes or dislikes to the public eye (shall we say taste buds?); it is to assert oneself as a connoisseur in the matter of cuisine. Of course, connoisseurs like great minds do not all think and taste the same way; they nonetheless abide by a certain etiquette.

To wash down an appetizer of mussels with a liquor-flavored coffee before the main course appears to be an utterly amateurish faux pas.

Now, to wash down an appetizer of mussels with a liquor-flavored coffee before the main course — like The Journal's Aaron West candidly did at Chez Piggy — appears to be an utterly amateurish faux pas. First, such a grotesque violation of etiquette might very well account for the "condescending pretension on the part of [the] server" discerned by the reporter. Second, it should be remembered the purpose of "washing down" is to clear the palate in between courses to fully appreciate the richness of every plate. Indulging in "laced and whipped espresso" before the main course is best left to nouveaux riches; connoisseurs should know better.

Santé!

Mulroney not worthy of award

Dear Editor,

Who ever decided that Brian Mulroney, who, when he took office, declared that Canada was bankrupt and went ahead and tripled our debt, deserves Canada's highest honor?

Could it be the people on starvation wages, the unemployed, those on social assistance, the poor old age pensioners, the poverty stricken single parents and their hungry children, the unfortunate jailed who may be forced to balance the scale of an unjust social system, the nurses and other's who are worked to a frazzle, the people who watch their loved ones suffer and die because there is no money for doctors and a hospital bed etc, etc?

Who hears their helpless, anguished silent cries?

All this suffering is a direct consequence of the monstrous Canadian debt caused by Mulroney and Co. And he gets an award? Shouldn't he be tarred and feathered, stripped of all his assets and sent to the gulag to pay off his debts and the misery he caused? Surely, he wouldn't be lonely as he deserves plenty of company.

A Liberal, but an individual

Dear Editors,

In response to the letter submitted by Mr. Girvin, I would like to clarify several aspects over what the aforementioned individual commented about in his commentary.

Mr. Girvin claimed that by virtue of my comments on how I despise recent decisions made by the Liberals and then remaining supportive of them demonstrated a lack of personal integrity. Well, if Mr. Girvin had paid attention to what I wrote, he would have seen that I was standing up for my beliefs. I find that Mr. Girvin's letter was acutely superficial and misguided, since the whole basis of my argument was that members of a political party should be able to critically examine their own party while still being a member of it.

In Canada the former person will be admitted to university and then have to borrow to finance their education, while in France that person will not be admitted to university and will be shunted into a life stream where their potential is wasted. To argue that the French system is somehow more accessible than Canada's is both perverse and contrary to the statistics.

Mr. Worrall may argue that the cost of university is a barrier to accessibility, and that would be true if we were required to pay it up front. But most university students borrow to fund their education, and then pay that debt back from their future incomes. So long as the future income of university graduates is greater than that of non-university graduates (and right now it is on average about 60 per cent greater over the course of their lifetime), the cost of an education is not much of an impediment.

As for the assertion that having more people attending university doesn't mean that it is more accessible, I beg to differ. By definition if more people have access it is more accessible.

Mr. Girvin's saying that my article was a "self-congratulatory whine" is simply ludicrous.

Accessibility is a contestable concept

Dear Editors,

I would like to reply to Mr. Worrall's comments about my letter in The Journal of October 20. If Mr. Worrall would like the sources for my data, the figures on university attendance are from my first-year politics 110 textbook written by Rand Dick and the second figure on post-secondary education come from the OECD web page.

There is systemic discrimination in the Baccalaureate program which deters many who may be qualified, but who through either social pressures or class discrimination do not get to attend university. Furthermore, academic performance in high school is not always a good indicator of a potential. A person who is surrounded by a peer group who is not interested in university will not do as well as someone whose parents are educated, with peers who all want to go to university.

This is his story. The summertime for Coast Guard student employees tends to be slow. Precious worked with two other men on a light craft used to supplement the Coast Guard fleet in the busy summer months. Precious said most of his time was spent towing in boats who ran out of fuel, doing safety checks and helping boaters who needed some assistance out at sea.

Into the bleak

The last week of summer for Queen's student Bruce Precious was spent searching for survivors and recovering debris from Swissair Flight 111

WHEN SWISSAIR 111 CRASHED into the waters off Blandford, Nova Scotia, there was a tremendous rescue effort. The Coast Guard, the Navy, the Army, local fishermen and volunteers joined together to comb the wreckage in the hope of finding survivors. The media, stationed at Peggy's Cove, gave reports on search efforts and relayed an ever-worsening picture of human loss and disaster.

Bruce Precious is a fourth-year life sciences student at Queen's. He was also a member of the Coast Guard summer program in Nova Scotia. Like hundreds of other volunteers and tireless rescue workers, Precious spent the last week of his summer scouring the Atlantic Ocean, looking for survivors and recovering debris from the horrific disaster.

"Just by what you could see there you kind of knew you were not going to find anyone... The wreckage was small, there was so much of it, and it was everywhere."

"Occasionally you'll have something that's a little more serious," said Precious. "You usually get like three or four really important calls a summer."

Precious worked at the Mahone Bay Coast Guard station on a seven days on, seven days off schedule. The station had two crews of three employees. Precious, a member of "Crew A," said he and his colleagues became close friends over the summer. "You work for these guys for 12 hours a day for seven days... you get to know them pretty quickly," he said.

On the evening of September 2, Precious and his friends from Crew A were celebrating the near-end of a summer's work. Their final shift was starting the next morning.

SWISSAIR FLIGHT 111 CRASHED off the shore of Blandford, about 15 kilometres from Precious's cottage, at 10:18 that night. The noise resonated through the province's southern shore, but Precious said they didn't know about the crash until later that night. "We didn't hear it," he said. "We were a bit too far."

The phone rang at 7:30 a.m. the next morning and Precious's supervisor told him and his colleagues the news. "We were like, 'wow'..." he said. "We turned on the radio and it was all over the place, everyone was talking about it."

Precious's crew replaced the B crew first thing that morning at 8:30, beginning a very difficult week at the crash site.

"We got to work, and they sent us out in the boat right away," he said. "We got out there and all you could see were ships. It was like a floating city. You'd look up and there'd be five or six helicopters flying around. There was so much visual activity that was never there before. Normally in that area it's just open water."

The Navy was acting as on-scene commander, and Precious said his crew spent the first day following strict orders in a rescue effort.

"At first it was a little more intense, because they still weren't sure if there might be some survivors. They wanted to make sure they were covering the whole area quickly," he said.

Precious said it was obvious from the beginning that there were no survivors of the crash. "Just by what you could see there you kind of knew you were not going to find anyone... The wreckage was small, there was so much of it, and it was everywhere," he said.

Officials on the scene announced after the first 24 hours of searching that they would not proceed with a rescue operation.

Once the search for survivors was called off, Precious and his crew were told to concentrate on recovering debris, including human remains.

"At first that was the priority, getting the remains, because they wanted to identify the body," he said.

Precious said he found it hard to collect human remains, but it was not as gruesome as he expected. "You're picking up all sorts of stuff," he said. "We were pretty quick in getting them into body bags... You almost didn't know at times what things were, and I guess that made things easier," he said.

"The debris field was so big it was hard to see anything else," he said. "There was broken parts of the plane, personal belongings everywhere... It looked like a big field of garbage on the water."

The scene, he said, was overpowering. "The plane had to dump its fuel, so there was jet fuel everywhere. There was an overwhelming smell... The weather, of course, was really bad. There were lots of waves, and rain. You were wet and cold, and I guess a little bit seasick... from the waves or what, you don't know."

Grief counsellors were available for rescuers feeling burdened by their work. Precious went to one session, and said he relied on his co-workers to get through tough times. "We got along pretty well I guess... you feel pretty comfortable after a summer of working together."

When asked about his feelings looking back on the incident, Precious said it was the magnitude of the disaster that hit home the most.

"The worst part of it was just realizing the significance of what had happened, all the people that died."

He explained that during the first few days of the clean-up, his crew was so busy that they didn't have a notion of the bigger picture of the disaster. Getting five or six hours of sleep a night in the Coast Guard trailer, Precious said he was almost completely removed from contact with mourning families or the media.

Once the rescue mission was called off, Precious and his crew were told to concentrate on recovering debris, including human remains.

WHEN THE URGENCY of the clean-up subsided, the crew was allowed to go home at night. Precious said once he saw reports of the crash on television his perspective of the event changed significantly.

The media reported from Peggy's Cove, a major tourist location in Nova Scotia characterized by a large lighthouse on granite rock. However, Precious said the crash "wasn't anywhere near Peggy's Cove... we couldn't see Peggy's Cove." He suggested that the site may have been chosen because of its proximity to the ocean and because of Peggy's Cove status as a major Canadian landmark.

The content of media broadcasts also struck Precious.

"What was being reported was different," he said. "Often the reporters knew more than we did." Precious said they would tune in to get an idea of how the overall project was progressing. "We would watch T.V. to know what we would be doing the next day, to find out what had been accomplished."

Precious also said interviews with families of victims had an impact on how he thought about the disaster.

"They were talking about the families and everything and it kind of struck you, because we were just picking debris out of the water," he said. "It made you realize what the significance was."

KISS IT GOODBYE
The Globe and Mail reported last Thursday that Major League Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig is taking steps to ban the drug androstenedione. This steroid was used by Mark McGwire when he demolished Roger Maris's home run record of 61. McGwire finished with 70 but it appears that his record is now going to be tarnished permanently. This drug is already banned by the Olympics and the NFL, and it appears baseball is determined to follow suit. It is already declared illegal in Canada because of certain health risks. It is nice to see that baseball is finally giving this matter the attention it deserves and since the player's union agrees with the Commissioner's office, this banishment appears to be a done deal.

By winning the final formula one race of the season in Suzuka, Japan, the "Flying Finn" Mika Hakkinen earned the F-1 driver's championship. He beat out German superstar Michael Schumacher, who had a tire blowout during the 32nd lap, to win the crown. The loss by Schumacher and his Ferrari team set off a wave of disappointment for the incredibly dedicated Ferrari fans, who have not enjoyed a driver's title since the late seventies. With the talented German at the controls, it is only a matter of time.

CFL REVIVAL
Much like the comeback by Major League Baseball, the Canadian Football League has seen individual performances pace a revival of the whole league. With Montreal running back Mike Pringle tearing off more than 2,000 yards rushing, setting a new single season mark, and Toronto receiver Darrell Mitchell breaking both reception and yardage records, the CFL has seen some phenomenal performances. These showings, coupled with the re-emergence of Hamilton and Montreal as powerful squads, begs the question — is the Canadian league stronger without Doug Flutie?

Hallowe'en horror show

Bishop's runs away with playoff spot

BY ADAM KAMINSKY

Two groups of students were dressed up as football players for Hallowe'en on Saturday afternoon at Richardson Stadium, but the group from Lennoxville was more convincing.

In a game that decided the Ontario-Quebec Interuniversity Football Conference's fourth and final playoff spot, the Bishop's Gaitsers manhandled the Queen's Golden Gaels by a 39-20 score.

With 413 rushing yards and 513 yards of total offence, the Gaitsers ran a textbook version of the wing-T attack, and there was nothing that the Gaels defence could counter with.

"[Bishop's offensive players] were big and strong in there and they ran a great offence that we couldn't stop," said graduating defensive tackle James Osborne.

"We could not respond to their offence, we couldn't stop the run."

Running back Ben Ouimet, who killed Queen's in this season's first encounter at Bishop's, ran wild again with 182 yards and a touchdown on only 10 carries. He added a 26-yard touchdown reception to his ground total offence.

Ouimet was complemented by O-QIFC rushing leader O.J. Burnett, who had 140 yards on the ground and two major scores on the afternoon.

"We focused on keying on the guards all week in practice and they were ready for it," explained defensive standout Derek

Western ends dreams of championship

BY NEATE SAGER

In the latest installment in one of the most intensely contested rivalries in Canadian intercollegiate sports, the Western Mustangs outlasted the host Queen's Golden Gaels in Saturday's OUA men's rugby semi-final at Kingston Field, prevailing 16-9.

The defeat was a bitter pill to swallow for the Tricolour, as Head Coach Al

Ferguson's talented first XV battled courageously against the purple-clad visitors to the final whistle. With two evenly-matched opponents and the rivalry enveloping the contest, what transpired was a tightly played affair. At times it was difficult for either side to make any offensive advances.

One step from national glory

BY ADAM KAMINSKY

The women's soccer team enjoyed the pleasant weather and two big victories in the OUA Championships at Carleton University last weekend, but came up a little short in their quest for an OUA title.

The championship game loss to Western was disappointing but the Gaels' two previous victories over Laurier and Ottawa qualified the team for the CIAU championships in Victoria, moving one step closer to their ultimate dream, a national title.

Coming into the weekend as the number one team in the land, undefeated in conference play, and the top-seeded team from the OUA East, much was expected of the Gaels. Despite the pressure, the squad performed admirably.

"It was surprising that in the biggest game of the year, the girls came out and didn't play their best game," said Head Coach Dave McDowell.

Coming off that performance, the Gaels were set to play their arch-rivals, the Ottawa Gee-Gees in the semi-final. In a scrappy and physical game, which was affected by a bright sun, Queen's was able to Queen's continued to press in the second half and were rewarded when all-Canadian Raeleen Dunne potted a penalty kick.

Women's basketball

In women's basketball this past weekend, the Gaels came away with a silver medal at the Western Invitational. On the road to their second-place finish, the Gaels defeated Laurier 69-46 on the strength of Wendy Moon's 16 points and Andrea Thompson's 11 points. Their next match against Windsor resulted in a 57-44 Gael victory with Moon scoring 20 points and getting eight rebounds. Jacqueline Beaudoin contributed 11 points in the victory as well. The Gaels fell far short in the final, however as they lost to Western 83-59. Moon, who scored 12 points in the final, was named to the tournament all-star team.

with his 200m breastroke and backstroke victories. Jess Reid won gold in the 50m freestyle and Tiffany Kent won gold in the 100m butterfly. Andrew Jones won gold in the 100m breastroke and Chris Graham won gold in the 50m butterfly. Jess Fulton won double gold in both the 100m and 200m breastrokes and Jake Wall won double gold medals in the 50m and 100m freestyles.

Men's hockey

In men's hockey action, the Gaels split the weekend with a 3-2 victory over Western and a 6-3 loss to Windsor. Scoring in the victory were Rob Mailloux, Damien Gilbert and Aaron Knight.

Women's volleyball

While competing in the Ryeson Invitational this past weekend, the women's volleyball team came away with a gold medal victory courtesy of a 3-0 victory over Waterloo. On the way to the gold, the Gaels dominated Ryeson and Trent by counts of 2-0. Krisline Spekkens was named MVP of the tournament.

Women's hockey

The women's hockey team are still looking for their first victory of the season after dropping two contests to Wilfrid Laurier 6-3 and 5-2. The Gaels must find a way to match the level of intensity that they showed in their first two games of the season against the mighty University of Toronto.

Men's soccer

The men's soccer season came to an end last weekend after they lost a contest to the University of Toronto by a count of 3-0 in the OUA championship semi-finals. After winning their last game to enter the playoffs, the team simply did not have the firepower to keep up with the talented Varsity Blues side. The team now has the winter to think about what they need to do to.

Swimming

The men's lacrosse squad ended their season on a disappointing note by winning one game and losing two at the championship tournament in Guelph. With a 12-6 loss to York, a 13-12 win over Laurier and a 9-8 loss to McMaster, the team finished in sixth place. Jake Kuiken and Neil 'the scoring machine' Boon paced the team with six goals apiece over the weekend, while Kevin Lunnie tallied five.

Men's volleyball

The men's volleyball team recorded a victory and a loss last week as they pummeled Laurentian 3-0 (15-10, 15-10, 15-4) but lost a tough one to Toronto by a 3-2 score (11-15, 15-11, 8-15, 16-14, 15-10). The loss to Toronto was a lively one, involving a 'volleybrawl' in the third game. After an alleged late spike by a Queen's player, the University of Toronto squad attacked from under the net, causing a commotion with pushing and shoving. The match is currently under protest and is being reviewed by the Queen's athletic department. A second side note to the loss was that Queen's enjoyed a two sets to one lead and a 14-8 lead in the fourth set, only to come up short on seven opportunities and then lose the fifth set.

X-country qualifies

BY ADAM KAMINSKY

The men's and women's cross-country teams travelled to the OUA Championships in Windsor with similar ambitions, but left with very different results.

The women's squad arrived as the number eight team in the nation and surprised many by winning the silver medal. The team was paced by captain, and team leader, Tara Lohman who finished in 11th spot. Charlotte Wilson finished one spot behind Lohman and Jennifer Grantier finished in 20th spot for Queen's.

The women finished second behind the powerful Western Mustangs, who are the top ranked team in the CIAU, thus finishing in the top five and qualifying for the CIAU championships.

Things did not work out as well for the men's squad, who finished in a disappointing fourth place. Coming into the event as the third ranked team in the nation, the team simply ran below their ability.

Shawn Brady led the team with an eighth place finish, which granted him all-conference status. Captain Bob McGill, who is traditionally the team leader, finished in 11th place, while Jamie Cleveland rounded out the Gaels presence in the top-20 by finishing in 16th place.

"I went hard, but I didn't have the legs and it wasn't my day," said McGill. "We collectively had a terrible day at the race."

By finishing in the top five, the men will have an opportunity to redeem themselves in two weeks at the CIAU Championships in Waterloo.

"The guys are really motivated to turn it around from last weekend," said Head Coach Shane Lakins.

Both teams will enter the national university championships with a great deal of anticipation and they feel that they can really make an impression. "We have the potential to have both [teams] in the top-five and maybe medal," said Lakins.

They will try and turn it around on November 14 in Waterloo.

Great effort in loss

With the wind and sun at their backs for the second half, the Gaels regrouped for the final 40 minutes, seizing momentum from the first resumption of play. Fly-half Paul Hemmings kicked two quick penalties to draw Queen's within two points, each time converting from a difficult angle. A short time later, Hemmings received an opportunity to vault the Gaels into the lead, but his long penalty attempt stubbornly stayed left and narrowly missed the posts.

Having received a reprieve, the Mustangs pushed vigorously for breathing room, their forward scrums moving at an ominous, glacial pace, as the Gaels valiantly tried to hold firm. However, Western's second try, 15 minutes into the second half, gave the Mustangs a 13-6 stranglehold and seemed to indicate that fate rested with the visitors.

The Gaels responded, raging against the dying of their light, as Hemmings's third penalty pulled Queen's within a try of the lead, 13-9. Two other thrusts deep into Western territory came agonizingly close to succeeding, but were denied by the resolute Mustangs' defenders. In the final minutes of play, the Mustangs doggedly kept the play, salting away the win with a successful drop kick, which touched off a joyous celebration along the visitors' sideline.

Though understandably disappointed by the result, Ferguson was satisfied by his club's effort. "We really came along over the year. I'm really proud of every last one of them."

Final game for some

Spronck. "They were pulling their guards in the opposite directions and using dummies to confuse us."

The story of the game was really told in a second quarter that saw the Gaeters run off 21 unanswered points in just over five minutes. This turned a two point game into a disastrous 23 point halftime deficit for Queen's. With the triple threat backfield of Burnett, Ouimet and Rich Bailey all scoring during this barrage, the Gaeters ran away with the Gaels' post-season dreams.

"[The graduating players] are moving on, but hopefully they will have learned something that will make them stronger."

— Head Coach Bob Howes

"We could not respond to their offence, we couldn't stop the run," lamented Queen's Head Coach Bob Howes.

While the Bishop's offence was the story of the day, Queen's was able to move the ball early on, but couldn't convert when they needed to.

"We had some chances right away quick, but we dropped the ball," said Howes.

The Gaels were able to score on a well-designed 57-yard bomb from quarterback Beau Howes to wide receiver Jason Wimmer, but that was the extent of the first-half offence for Queen's. All-conference running back Paul Correale only handled the ball five times in the first-half, while erstwhile back-up quarterback Dustin Falscheer could not complete anything in his short stint at the helm. By the time

Beau Howes completed a 64-yard touchdown pass to James MacLean in the middle of the third quarter, it was too little, too late.

"[Queen's] is a very good running team, we felt if we could stop the run, we could stop them," said Bishop's Head Coach Ian Breck.

Correale rounded out the scoring with less than a minute remaining with a one-yard touchdown scamper, but that came well after the traditional Gatorade shower was given to the victorious coach.

This win was especially sweet for the Gaeters after a tough '97 season, a campaign where Bishop's went 6-2 on the field, but lost three games to ineligible players and missed the playoffs.

"As a coach who was part of last year's team and the problems, I am really happy for the kids who missed the playoffs last year by no fault of their own," said Breck.

For the Gaels this was an extremely tough season, one rife with expectation and subsequently disappointment. Having seen their eligibility elapse with the loss to Bishop's, notable veterans Jonathan Taylor, Max Turner, Matt Rasmussen, James Osborne, Nathan Box, Rob Chalmers and Jim 'the sack guru' Aru, played their final game for Queen's. For all of them to have been part of the rebuilding of a university football giant, only to end their careers as they began, short of the playoffs, is frustrating. While championship dreams were never realized, more than football was learned in the Gael program.

"[The graduating players] are moving on, but hopefully they will have learned something that will make them stronger," said Bob Howes.

For those who are returning, a disappointed Derek Spronck expressed it best. "I'll be back."

Blue days ahead for Toronto

WORD ON THE STREET

YIKES. THE TORONTO Blue Jays are continuing their downward spiral this off-season by cancelling their SkyDome lease and threatening to move back to Exhibition Stadium.

The Belgian brewery Interbrew, which owns the team and 49 percent of SkyDome, is upset that the Jays are not getting a larger share of the revenue from concessions during the games. All the other major league baseball teams receive between 35 and 45 per cent of their stadium's concession revenue, but the Blue Jays only receive 19 per cent.

SkyDome is in debt and is unable to give the Blue Jays the added revenue they desire. At the same time, however, the Blue Jays are the tenant that provides the bulk of the revenue for the stadium. Without the Blue Jays, the SkyDome would be virtually abandoned, as most entertainment events will move to the new Air Canada Centre when it opens in February.

All this has led to Interbrew's threat to move the team back to its old home next to Lake Ontario. A return to Exhibition Stadium would require a lot of work because the park is slated for demolition at the beginning of December. The playing field has been ripped up and most of the seats have been sold to nostalgic fans for $35 each. Reaction to this threat to return the Blue Jays to the Mistake-by-the-Lake has been mixed. Some fans have said that they would enjoy a return to the old stadium, yet from an economic standpoint it appears to make little sense. If the goal of Interbrew is to increase revenue, then they will have to do it without luxury boxes because there are none at Exhibition Stadium. There are also less seats in comparison to the SkyDome (not that the Blue Jays have been selling-out) and most of them do not even face home plate. This problem will also need to be addressed because it will be hard to convince fans that they should pay the same price for a cramped cold seat as they would for one under a retractable roof. A further issue is the one involving season ticket holders at SkyDome. Since there are less choice seats at Exhibition Stadium, there may be quite a few cancellations. These negative aspects could balance out, however, if Interbrew was collecting 100 per cent of the concession revenues.

This problem with the lease is just the latest one of many that have confronted the Blue Jays organization since the 1998 season came to a close. In October, the Blue Jays fired coaches Eddie Rodriguez and Jack Hubbard and replaced them with Lloyd Moseby and Sal Butera. General Manager Gord Ash had to fly manager Tim Johnson and pitching coach Mel Queen to his office in Toronto to sort out another dispute. Queen and some players were upset over comments that Johnson reportedly made about his involvement in the Vietnam War. Apparently Johnson told some of his players that he had killed people as a marine in Vietnam but in reality he was only in the reserves and never left the United States. Publicly, however, everything is apparently fine and both men have agreed to work together for the 1999 season.

It is difficult to fathom that it has been five years since the Labatt's-owned Toronto Blue Jays organization was the envy of all major league baseball.

A further problem that has plagued the Blue Jays thus far in the off-season has been Interbrew's failure to approve a team budget for next season. While teams are unable to sign free agents until Friday, it does give an impression of instability. This may hurt the team's chances to attract top free agent talent. The Blue Jays desperately need a quality second baseman, a left-handed starter and an outfielder to complement Shawn Green and Shannon Stewart. Jose Cruz, Jr. could possibly fill the spot but he had such a drastically inconsistent season last year that he is an uncertainty. Money will also have to be allocated to find a designated hitter, be it Jose Canseco or someone else. With the New York Mets signing Mike Piazza to a seven-year $91 million deal, Carlos Delgado will be looking for similar money. Delgado had more home runs and runs batted in than Piazza last year despite missing the first month of the season.

It is difficult to fathom that it has been five years since the Labatt's-owned Toronto Blue Jays organization was the envy of all major league baseball. In 1993, the Blue Jays had just won back-to-back World Series championships and had a reputation as a first-class organization. Since that time, Labatt's has been bought by Interbrew and the cornerstones of Blue Jays management, Paul Beeston and Pat Gillick, have left the team. Things are looking up though, as the team recorded its first winning season in five years when they tallied 88 wins in Johnson's rookie campaign.

It remains to be seen if Interbrew can work out this latest roadblock. There are four serious options available to the franchise: stay at SkyDome, move to Exhibition Stadium, build a new baseball-only facility, or move the team. It is time for those officials at SkyDome to realize that the Blue Jays will survive without the SkyDome, but it does not work the other way around.

Robert MacNeil is prepared to wear a parka if Jays return to Exhibition Stadium

No OUA championship but CIAU dream lives

putting Queen's up by three and securing the victory that qualified the team for the CIAU championships.

"I am ecstatic with the way we played today," explained McDowell. "I thought we played very well after not playing well in yesterday's game."

The shutout was Foran's second of the weekend and her coach could not have been more pleased with her play.

"She has been terrific," he said. "[She was] tested maybe once or twice but she was very good at dealing with crosses and controlling her area."

Foran was also very happy with the victory, but said it did not come easily. "We have worked very hard for this," she said. "We have beaten Ottawa twice, so we knew we could do it."

The shutout win set up a championship game showdown between the first place teams from each of the divisions, as Queen's took on the Western Mustangs. The game for the OUA crown did not have an effect on the CIAU championship picture, which was fortunate for the Gaels as they were handed a 3-1 defeat.

"The players may have subconsciously let up a little bit, because they didn't come up with the same intensity," said coach McDowell.

This showed on the scoreboard as the Mustangs jumped out to a 2-0 lead in the first-half with their first goal coming only moments into the game. Queen's was able to come up with a goal by Ange Crockford before half-time, but were thwarted in repeated attempts on goal in the second-half.

"We pressured them a lot in the second, we out shot them and had more corners, but we hit posts and couldn't convert," said the disappointed coach.

Western then added an insurance goal to salt away the victory to win the OUA championship and hand the Gaels their first loss.

"It was a bit of a wake up call for the team," said McDowell. "The loss hurts a little bit because we didn't win a championship and that is pretty disappointing."

While Western quashed any chance of Queen's attaining their goal of a provincial crown, the dream of a national title remains alive. Their quest begins on November 13th in Victoria.

Pleasant surprise Pleasantville sees the world with a colourful eye

The colour and the shape: Tobey Maguire and Reese Witherspoon are lost in the role of Pleasantville.

FILM REVIEW

By ROBERT DE BELLEFEUILLE

In Gary Ross's modern fairy tale Pleasantville, an entire fictional town is granted a chance to experience the comedies, and dangers, of real life.

In this fantastical adventure, two teens accidentally bring living colour to a mysterious suburb trapped in a black-and-white fifties utopia and a revolution ensues. For the first time, Pleasantville's citizens experience a world of sensuous delights, diverse desires and unsettling events. They experience the terror of violence and the wonder of love, ultimately changing the way they view life.

Combining cutting-edge computer technology with comedy and fable like storytelling, Pleasantville is a wildly imaginative and wholly original tale that poses interesting questions about contemporary life.

Tobey Maguire and Reese Witherspoon star as twin siblings from a typical, broken nineties family. Through a mysterious chain of events, they find themselves trapped in an alternate reality where the thermometer always reads 72 degrees Fahrenheit, and sex just doesn't exist. Soon, the town undergoes an astonishing transformation, slowly turning from black-and-white to Technicolour. Pleasantville becomes divided, tife for the first time with stark differences as it attempts to grasp the kaleidoscopic new world before it. The story is not merely an allegory about television; on the contrary, the television in Pleasantville is a conduit to explore the morals and values and fantasies of an era gone by.

William H. Macy, of Fargo fame and Joan Allen portray the picture perfect couple of the fifties. Allen plays Mrs. Betty Parker, a woman on the brink of an exciting and emotional self-discovery.

Macy encapsulates the vintage father of the fifties as he remarks periodically in Ward Cleaver fashion: "that's swell."

Betty is a fictional creation of the perfect, unquestioning housewife until she begins to awaken to the possibilities in the world. Betty Parker's self-discovery also transforms the life of her husband, George (Macy) who is used to coming home to a peck on the cheek and a home-cooked dinner at the same time every single night. Macy encapsulates the vintage father of the fifties as he remarks periodically in Ward Cleaver fashion: "that's swell."

Coming between George and Betty is Mr. Johnson, the mild-mannered soda jerk who becomes a wildly prismatic painter when colour comes to Pleasantville, character played amiably by Jeff Daniels. Mr. Johnson discovers spontaneous reactions and it spreads like wildfire through the impossibly perfect little town.

When the kaleidoscopic wrecking ball hits the Parker household, Betty Parker finds herself drawn to Mr. Johnson and his new powers of artistic expression. Despite the excitement and fascination with change that the citizens of Pleasantville discover, there remains a group of villagers who want the old ways to return. At the heart of this movement is Big Bob, the town's most influential member, played by the late great character actor J.T. Walsh.

The character who most changes Pleasantville's way of life is the mysterious television repairman played by iconic comedy legend Don Knotts, since he is the one who transports David and Jennifer into this surreal reality. You might remember Knotts from his tivating portrayal of Mr. Furley, the nosy-parker landlord who believes Jack is reveling in

Touching the surface

*surface magazine goes beyond the mainstream and stays on top

MAGAZINE REVIEW

*surface Surface Publishing Inc.

By JENNIFER HOWSE

At first glance, *surface magazine seems as if it is the staple for Guess jeans, Altoids and Camel cigarette ads. But, unlike most advertiser-friendly mainstream magazines such as Cosmopolitan or Q, there are no quizzes and no letters from readers agonizing over their unsightly monobrows.

This is a publication about the avant garde, and if this makes you nervous, take heed. *surface is not your typical magazine, and it's not for the cynical. It deals with the same pop culture issues that other magazines do — except *surface does it a little bit differently.

One page of text is written sideways so that you have to turn the magazine around to read, it like a fifteen year old with the Playboy centre-spread.

What strikes me most about *surface is its hit-you-over-the-head-with-quirkiness attitude. The pages are laid out without a particular form in mind. Sometimes the text is laid out on a slight angle, making you wonder if it maybe was just a bad day at the printers. One page of text is written sideways so that you have to turn the magazine around to read, it like a fifteen year old with the Playboy centre-spread. Once your eye gets used to the asymmetry of the text; however, you can pay attention to the articles.

The articles are concise and dense with artistic and political commentary. *surface writer Jenny Shears reports that "Kathleen Lambert's jewelry... challenges the body in a constantly shifting power-play between structural support and responding form." That's a pretty hefty responsibility for a necklace. I'm not saying that Shears is wasting her brain power by mediating the struggle between support and form. On the contrary, I think that she takes a new and interesting angle on art.

It's just not the kind of mindless reading that one yearns for after midterms. There are also staple celebrity profiles on Jennifer Jason Leigh and Naomi Campbell. Also included are art and music reviews featuring Morcheeba, Dimitri from Paris and Momo which focus on the personalities of the artists.

The short articles are effective, both because they accommodate the short attention spans of readers like me, and because they compliment the images, which, in my humble opinion, are the most interesting feature of the magazine.

Like most magazines, you get plenty of pictures of emaciated models wearing clothing that we all know nobody wears, the images however, like the text, are off-centre and jarring. They are frequently dimly lit, and there are plenty of extreme close-ups — so extreme that one could count the pores on the models' noses had they not been airbrushed away by the art department.

What strikes me most about *surface is its hit-you-over-the-head-with-quirkiness attitude.

Whether you embrace the avant garde or just find it trite and elitist, there is a little entertainment for everyone. I can't condone spending $5.25 for a good chuckle on the report about a designer fragrance-turned-laundry detergent, but if you feel like challenging and expanding your mind towards the obscure horizons of the art world, *surface is not an entirely bad way to spend an afternoon.

Keep your hands to yourself.

Pork Ne examines cats and other rarities

ART REVIEW

BY JESSICA KEEN

I am the first to admit that the field of modern art is still quite new to me. I must also say that I absolutely love cats. So when I first saw a replica of a small neglected looking alley cat in faux fur and wire, frozen midstride on the floor of the Union gallery, I was taken aback. There were graffiti-like cats tattooed to the ground where you trod, banners of abstract, twisting cats hanging from the ceiling, and huge paper canvases in an array of different colours and textures.

The artists involved with Pork Ne began their Queen's Fine Arts program in 1995, after attending various Ontario art schools. They have backgrounds in cartooning, photography, painting, drawing, video and sculpture.

Those Queen's alumni obviously put in a great deal of work in setting up this modern multimedia exhibit and it really does make use of this word in its wide array of media.

There was a contradiction to be found between the angry strokes, haunting cat heads and the purity of the subject.

As I am appreciative of music, the soundtrack that hit me as I entered the room became the backdrop to my feelings of disturbance.

Slowly pacing around the room, the bass beats, thunder-like waves of sound, creeks, grunting noises, and dubbed sounds of people having sex became my companions. (I shiver at the thought of where these effects might have been found.)

The source of these troubling sounds was the central art piece of the room; a house of sorts, made out of a big brown box with cut out windows, a door, and even a mail slot.

The backdrops on the walls were all slightly different, one clear black drawing on white with pastel yellow and pink. Another had many strong black jagged lines, very abstract with blends of blues, oranges and other fragments.

The exhibit bares a theme of innocence clashing with the harsh realities of life. This is exemplified in a piece that had "Hello Kitty" scrawled on the top. There was a contradiction to be found between the angry strokes, haunting cat heads and the purity of the subject.

One thing that struck me was that the Union Gallery simply did not mesh with this exhibit. Nice fluorescent lighting and white walls perfect for framed paintings and more typically displayed forms of art did not compliment the harsh, frustrating images. This perhaps creates a more shocking and striking effect to the viewer, and perhaps this then was the aim.

Slowly pacing around the room, the bass beats, thunder-like waves of sound, creeks, grunting noises, and dubbed sounds of people having sex became my companions.

I did recognize some Japanese-cartoon origins, and graffiti art which I have seen often in passing when taking the train. The hard work and creativity of Pork Ne is admirable. The exhibit makes the viewer realize that the modern arts culture that many of us nurture is at the expense of much beauty. While at the same time, the sensitivity it requires is definitely a challenge for our eyes, ears and most importantly our minds.

a threesome with Janet and Chrissy in the hit show Three's Company. Knotts serves as the ambassador to the film's true levity.

In its completed state, Pleasantville reveals the power that technical film-making elements have to provoke deep emotional responses. The tension between the deep sense of nostalgia imbued by the black-and-white Pleasantville and the visceral engagement of the sense excited by the full-colour Pleasantville becomes the film's theme.

Director Gary Ross's vision is indeed compelling and highly innovative in its indictment of a fifties utopia gone awry. The ambitious nature of the film is quite admirable but at times seems tedious while its revolutionary social commentary runs rampant.

Director Gary Ross's vision is indeed compelling and highly innovative in its indictment of a fifties utopia gone awry.

The ensemble cast generates a sustained chemistry that proves to be the film's most captivating draw as the picture delivers its moralistic sermon on society.

Although this preachy content becomes irritable, Pleasantville should not be overlooked.

QEA in the game

Queen's Entertainment Agency soars in the sound

Through the years, QEA has promoted various artists who were easy on the ears of Queen's students. From left to right: (Treblecharger, Travel Agent, Kardinal Offishal) the QEA is ultimately responsible to the students. It's a responsibility they do not take lightly.

The QEA is also a resource and a service for the campus; last year, the QEA helped with productions for the Arts Formal and the Charity Ball. In addition, the QEA accepts volunteers for marketing and advertising and draws its stagehands from the Queen's student body. In the past, the QEA has hosted such acts as Moist, Our Lady Peace, Ashley MacIsaac, Sloan and One Step Beyond.

This year, the QEA brought in 54-40 and Treblecharger for the Frosh Week show, as well as bringing Kardinal Offishal and the Rascalz to Alfie's. Upcoming performers include Johnny Favorite Swing Orchestra, jiving into town on November 7 for the Sci Formal, Maestro performing November 13 at Alfie's with Thrust of the Northern Touch, and Emm Gryner and the Philosopher Kings hitting Grant Hall November 19. There will also be an arena show, scheduled for the end of January, with headliners to be announced.

"Our stance this year is that we're really into music. We want to explore different genres and have some diversity."

— Sam Morris, Director of QEA.

Let's not forget QEA's contribution to the development of talent — the Battle of the Bands which hits Alfie's in March. Any other information or dates can be found at the QEA's web page, www.ams.queensu.ca/ams/qea.

AGENCY PROFILE

Director, work to provide live entertainment on campus for students — whether it be music concerts, comedians or guest speakers.

Room 022 of the John Deutsch University Centre is the nerve centre of the largest student-run Canadian campus programming organization; the office of the Queen's Entertainment Agency. It's here that John Lai, Production Manager; Neil Bunn, Marketing and Operations Managers, and the head of the feast, Samantha Morris, explore different genres and have some diversity," said Morris.

"We want to move into Jazz and Funk," added Lai.

Upcoming acts such as the Philosopher Kings, Johnny Favorite Swing Orchestra, and 54-40 illustrate the QEA's attempt to avoid mainstream Canadian rock and to maintain the interest of the organization's main source of revenue — the Queen's students. Revenue for the QEA comes from student fees. So, while it may fall under the wing of the AMS,

*"You're just a stepping stone,
You're just a stepping stone,
Believe me,
You'd be better on your own"*
— The Nylons

A WHILE AGO A FRIEND of mine told me she wasn't going to break up with her boyfriend even though things weren't working out. "Why?" I asked, "don't you want to get it over with now?" "Sure I do" she said, "I just haven't found anyone else yet."

Hmm. It may be easy for you, skeptical reader, to pass her attitude off as cruel, selfish and rare. However, though her half-conscious admittance is uncommon, I don't believe her logic is. I've seen it in action plenty of times and from many different people. It's happened to friends and it's happened to me. I've done it too. You see things aren't working out with someone (you've got in one too many fights, you're growing distanced or you're just grown tired of waking up with them, whatever), yet instead of letting them down right away, you consciously or unconsciously elect to search for, target, and move in on (or at least make reservations with) someone else first.

Maybe it's instinctual self-preservation: one might subconsciously wish to avoid a romantic lull because of a fragile self-image maintainable only through intimate attentions. Maybe it's cowardice: one might fear being alone more than prolonging a failing relationship. Maybe it's both. It really doesn't matter. It's usury. People exploit those they (might) genuinely care for in order to get what they want. If the usurer gets what he/she wants, then they toss the usee away.

What does this say about us young people? It doesn't exactly bode well for the department, less respect for people who've done it, and most of all, a necessary self-confrontation. After all, in identifying and analyzing this little someone else to have to go through the motions of dealing with being used because of a weakness on my part. But it's one of those things that's tough to follow through with because, as I've mentioned, it's not always completely intentional.

How's about this: next time you find yourself in a position where you're constantly sizing up the relationship potential of every guy or gal you lay eyes on and you're in a failing relationship and you think you might not have the pluckiness to end it without first placing someone in the on-deck circle, do me, yourself and your unlucky partner the favour of putting your relationship out of its misery right then and there.

You won't immediately be glad that you did. You'll still have to deal with the ass-pain of making the dump and tolerating its aftermaths. On top of that you won't have any new interest to turn your focus on. But at least you'll be doing the humane, conscientious thing. You might even feel less guilty, if you feel any guilt at all. Most importantly, you can walk away with the knowledge that you're able to walk away. To quote a defunct beer slogan, you'll "be your own dog."

humanist front. Moreover, it says a great deal about our independence: totally incapable of being alone for whatever reason, many of us are driven to take advantage of someone who has grown to trust them. For me, this realization translates social tidbit. I'm being hypocritical. I've done it. I've stood by and watched friends do it to other friends. On a constructive note, I'm willing to make the effort not to do it again. I know I felt like shit for a long time after it happened to me, and I wouldn't want

Noise complaints force temporary QP closure

BY JONATHAN TINNEY

The newly expanded Queen's Pub went through some growing pains this week. The pub was temporarily closed Wednesday evening due to noise complaints.

Occupants of the graduate student residence housed on the top three floors of the JDUC, sent a complaint to the Victoria Hall front desk about 2 a.m. on Wednesday morning and Campus Security was dispatched.

"It's been an ongoing issue," said second-year graduate student Miriam Lynch. "Last year there wasn't a problem but this year we have averaged two to three complaints a week since the beginning of September."

The QP management said they realize the problem exists and are taking steps to remedy the situation.

"It's been a problem, and it is a problem we are trying to work on," said QP Manager Mark Picketts. "The grads on the whole have been super nice to us. It's been frustrating to me, I can imagine how frustrating it must be for them trying to sleep."

The AMS said the problem must be solved. "We realize that, both legally and morally, we must do whatever it takes to reduce the disturbance to those living above the pub," said Gord Moodie, vice-president (operations).

This is not the first time the QP has been closed for noise complaints. Five years ago the pub was closed for several days due to objections from some upstairs residents.

To prevent future repeats of this week's closure, the QP management will be working with a sound engineer to determine if the noise problems can be corrected structurally. "If [the sound engineer] says it could be fixed easily, that would be my dream come true," said Picketts.

Please see 'Positive' on page 5

Admired professor's death mourned

BY SHAWN BRIMLEY

A funeral service held on Tuesday honoured the life of Queen's professor Sam Davis, an accomplished and admired Adjunct Professor in the School of Policy Studies. Dr. Davis passed away on October 28 after battling cancer for many years. He was 79.

Lisa Powell, professor with the School of Policy Studies said, "[Dr. Davis] was always warm and friendly, and he gave wonderful advice."

Born in Birkenhead, England, on April 18, 1919, Dr. Davis graduated from the University of Liverpool in 1940, with a degree in Naval Architecture. During World War II, he served on HMS Rodney during the battle with the German battleship Bismarck.

After coming to Canada after the war, Dr. Davis continued in the military, and eventually retired as a Rear Admiral and Commandant of the National Defence College at Fort Frontenac in 1974.

Lyn Freeman, MPA program coordinator with the School of Policy Studies, said in a eulogy address on Tuesday, "The man may have left the service, but the service did not leave the man."

Dr. Davis continued his education as a part-time student, eventually gathering six Masters degrees, and a PhD in 1979.

Freeman said, "When his faculty colleagues at the university became a little pretentious... this most unpretentious of men would quietly but firmly remind us that he had more degrees

Woman's struggle touches audience

BY STEFAN MURRAY

A woman known to the public and media only by her alias Jane Doe, explained her personal struggle and experiences to an audience at the Kingston Public Library on Tuesday evening.

Doe was sexually assaulted in 1986 and recently won a civil case filed against the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force. The name Jane Doe is being used as her alias after she successfully petitioned the Canadian court for legal and media anonymity.

Doe believes that anonymity is essential until changes are made that make the legal system safe for women. "I don't think it's a safe, wise or dignified place for a woman to be," she explained.

"Raped women are framed socially and within the legal system as broken, not whole."

— Jane Doe

Doe spoke for more than one hour to a crowd of approximately 50 people. She discussed her prolonged conflict with the Canadian legal system

Fall referendum 1998

By THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

The AMS fall referendum campaign opened on Monday. In addition to nine questions posed by campus groups seeking funding, students will also have the chance to choose their next Rector.

The position of Rector was established in 1969 as a student-elected member of Queen's Board of Trustees. The Rector also acts as a student advisor and advocate on university affairs.

The two Rector candidates are:

- Mike Kealy (Law '01)
- Jim Quinn (Nurs '00)

There are four new referendum questions to hit the polls.

- Do you agree to the establishment of a $1.95 fee (mandatory) to support joining the Ontario Undergraduate Students Alliance (OUSA) as full members?
- Do you agree to the establishment of a $2.12 fee (subject to individual opt-out) to support the ENGERAMA club?
- Do you agree to the establishment of a $0.95 fee (subject to individual opt-out) to support the Queen's Debating Union?
- Do you agree to the establishment of a $0.75 fee (subject to individual opt-out) to support HIV and AIDS Regional Services?

The five remaining questions concern already established campus groups seeking funding renewal.

- Do you agree to the continuation of the Queen's Bands Fee of $3.00 (mandatory) for the next three years? This fee was originally established in 1986 and last went to referendum in 1996.
- Do you agree to the continuation of the Summer Walkhome Fee of $2.00 (mandatory) for the next three years, payable only by any student enrolled in the Spring/Summer or Summer terms, and tied to the Consumer Price Index? This fee was originally established in 1996 and last went to referendum in 1996.
- Do you agree to an increase in the Fall/Winter Walkhome Fee (mandatory) from $8.56 to $9.56, an increase of $1.00, for the next three years? This fee was originally established in 1996 and last went to referendum in 1996.
- Do you agree to the continuation of The Queen's Journal Fee of $2.50 (mandatory) for the next three years? This fee was originally established prior to 1977, and last went to referendum in 1996.

Several plebiscite or survey-type questions, will also allow the AMS to find out student reaction to services such as bursaries, special projects and the AMS Health Plan.

Voting will take place November 10 and 11 in polling stations across campus. Students are required to present valid student identification.

CORRECTION

In the last issue, the act governing property standards should have been identified as the Kingston Property Standards By-Law. The Journal regrets the error.

Speaker educates women, initiates change

Following her rape and the negative perception of assaulted women maintained by the public, media and courts. "Raped women are framed socially and within the legal system as broken, not whole," said Doe.

The ruling earlier this year ended a 12-year battle and held the police guilty of negligence and systematic gender discrimination under Chapter 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The outcome of the trial has been hailed as a landmark precedent by members of the feminist community and those concerned with police discrimination against women.

The outcome of the trial has been hailed as a landmark precedent by... the feminist community and those concerned with police discrimination against women.

"The ruling lets police know that their practices will be under extra scrutiny," said Ruth Warner, a counsellor at the Sexual Assault Crisis Centre (Kingston). "It gives women the right to go forward and challenge police practices."

Although not disregarding the importance of the decision, Doe maintained that its effects are not yet apparent. "The judgement is a piece of paper," she said. "How we implement it remains to be seen."

In her speech, Doe also discussed the many factors that continually brutalize a woman who has been raped, long after her assault.

She contended that the ability of investigating officers to obtain and submit criminal, mental and medical backgrounds of victims as evidence, along with the dominant role of men in the legal and medical community help to diminish the assaulted women's access to justice.

"The ruling lets police know that their practices will be under extra scrutiny."

— Ruth Warner, counsellor at the Sexual Assault Crisis Centre (Kingston)

According to Doe, the current language used to describe crimes of violence against women is also very damaging.

"It puts the emphasis on the women and not the perpetrator of the crime," she said.

Doe has been travelling across the province since she won her case delivering her story and experiences to women who are concerned about these issues.

"What I hope to do is disseminate info based on my lived experience that will help and encourage women to make informed decisions about entering the legal system... and work to make changes within that system that will address the appalling statistic that presently only one in 10 of us reports the crime," she said.

Camp Outlook bus vandalized outside home

By FIONA STEVENSON

The only school bus belonging to Camp Outlook, a non-profit children's camp run by Queen's student volunteers, was vandalized last Thursday. Repair costs may seriously affect the camp's ability to offer free programming to local youth.

"There's no telling how it's going to affect things... We run completely or donations so basically every cent counts," said Matthew Struthers, Camp Outlook's coordinator.

The half-sized school bus was parked outside the residence of Ian Brooks, Camp Outlook's fall/winter co-director, at Brock and Division Streets last Thursday evening.

"We've been having problems with [the bus] getting vandalized on campus," explained Brooks.

"A broken window might mean that one less kid goes to camp."

— Matthew Struthers, Camp Outlook coordinator

"It's become an inconvenience but we've decided we can't keep it around campus, which is kind of sad," Struthers said. "You shouldn't have to worry about where you put your bus."

"I was up working all night [last Thursday]," Brooks said.

"There were fights going on all night on the street." When Brooks left the house the next morning, he noticed the back window of the bus was smashed.

"We've filed a report with the police," Brooks explained, but so far no one has been charged. "I guess vandalism of this sort is pretty common and there's nothing they can do about it."

"Our best guess is that it was probably a Queen's student who hit the bars," Brooks said.

"[The vandal or vandals] screwed up something for an organization that just wants to do decent things for kids in Kingston and doesn't have the money to pay for this kind of thing," he added.

Camp Outlook's fall operating budget is approximately $150, Brooks said, and the cost of replacing the broken window is approximately $100. "This really messes with our finances," he said, adding, "I have no idea why a bus that's got a camp's name on it gets vandalized."

"I have no idea why a bus that's got a camp's name on it gets vandalized."

— Ian Brooks, Camp Outlook fall/winter co-director

"We put a lot of effort into fund raising. It's sad to see the money wasted," Struthers said. "A broken window might mean that one less kid goes to camp."

The bus is temporarily being stored at a location further away from campus. "It's clear we couldn't really keep it where it was," Struthers explained.

Camp Outlook is in its 29th year of operation. The camp offers free summer, fall, and winter camps to approximately 200 local children per year. It runs from the John Deutsch University Centre.

The back window of Camp Outlook's only school bus was smashed last Thursday evening.

SGPS to compensate law students for missed month of health coverage

By REBECCA STELTER

The Law Students' Society move from the Alma Mater Society to the Society of Graduate and Professional Students last spring meant law students were not given health coverage in September. However, the SGPS has made a commitment to ensure law students are covered.

"I don't believe anyone was informed. I think it was just an oversight."

— Marcelle Cerny, SGPS representative for the LSS.

"There was a lag period in the month of September," explained Chris Hales, SGPS president. "The AMS plan ends August 30 and starts its year again on September 1, whereas the SGPS health plan does not begin its coverage until October 1." The transfer left law students without health coverage for one month, posing problems for students who needed to be reimbursed for medical costs, such as prescriptions.

The decision to switch student governments was reached in a referendum held last March by the LSS. Of the 55 per cent of law students who participated, two thirds voted in favour of a move to the SGPS.

The cost of a SGPS health plan is $180.71, while this year's AMS health plan costs $87.50.

The SGPS has been handling law students' health claims on a personal, case by case basis, said Deb Hume, SGPS vice-president (services).

"All claims are being fixed so that it won't cost [law students] anything," Hume said. The costs are presently being covered by an SGPS emergency fund, but hopefully Canada Life will reimburse these extra claims, she added.

According to Hume, the SGPS health plan has had an October 1 start for the last five years, and law students should have been aware of this as of June, 1998, when they received The Guide, an SGPS day planner.

"All claims are being fixed so that it won't cost [law students] anything."

— Deb Hume, SGPS vice-president (services)

"I don't believe anyone was informed. I think it was just an oversight," said Marcelle Cerny, SGPS representative for the LSS.

LSS President Chris Ellis said that, before the March referendum "the Law Students' Society negotiating committee compiled a report and in it we outlined exactly what the differences were between the AMS and the SGPS." This report included information on the health plans offered by both societies, he said.

"I didn't even know about [the health plan problem] until it had happened," Ellis said.

"I guess that once they left to go to the other society, that was one of the wrinkles in the switch," speculated Gord Moodie, AMS vice-president (operations).

"Most of the questions are filtered through me because I'm the contact, but concerns really haven't been an issue," said Cerny, "just some questions as to how students go about getting their money."

Hume said if law students "have any concerns or complaints, they can come into the [SGPS] office and talk to us."

As of next year, the SGPS will be changing their health plan so that it begins on September 1 to eliminate any further health coverage issues, Hume explained.

AMS services cards hit campus this week

BY JOCELYN LAPORTE

The Alma Mater Society launched its frequent buyer card program this week, inviting students to earn free products and discounts at four AMS services.

"We want to communicate to students that the services are student-run and run for them,"

—Gord Moodie, AMS vice-president (operations)

The cards allow students to collect stamps for purchases made at the Publishing and Copy Centre, the Queen's Pub, Alfie's Pub and the Used Bookstore Exchange. The cards can be picked up at these services, the AMS front desk or the Infobank.

"We want to communicate to students that the services are student-run and run for them," said Gord Moodie, AMS vice president (operations).

The cards are divided into four sections, one for each of the services. Five colour copies at the P&CC earn a free glossy colour copy; five sandwiches at the QP earn a free order of hummus and pita, and five entries to Alfie's before 10 p.m. earn a free order of fries. Finally, three purchases exceeding $10 at the UBS Exchange will earn buyers a 25 per cent discount on their next purchase.

"Ideally the effect will be to increase revenue for the AMS. If each card produces a $0.20 increase in revenue it will increase the AMS revenue," said Moodie.

Once all spaces on the card are stamped, it can be entered into a grand prize draw to be held at the end of the year for two "Long Haul" round-trip tickets to anywhere in North America Air Canada flies, including the Caribbean and Hawaii.

"There is nothing eye catching about it being free, it just looks like any other card advertising for the AMS."

— Kristine Lee, second-year Masters student

"It's a win-win, win-win situation," said Moodie.

Students can pick up official rules and restrictions for the contest at the AMS front desk. The cards are receiving mixed reviews from students.

"I think it's a good idea because its promoting spending on campus but logistically I don't think it will work. I don't know if people really want to go into Alfie's before 10 five times just to get free fries," said Erika Vines, PHE '99.

A second-year Masters student from the school of urban and regional planning, Kristine Lee, agreed the basic idea of the card was good, but that there were some promotional problems.

"There is nothing eye catching about it being free, it just looks like any other card advertising for the AMS," Lee said.

Others suggested the AMS should have had a survey about the prizes the services were offering. "I think the card's a good idea but I don't know about the prizes," said Joe Frassero, Sci '02.

The new AMS services card will allow students to enjoy the perks of their commitment to campus services.

Challenge expands minds

BY HILARY CLARK

Enthusiastic teams, challenging events and special skills were in full force Wednesday evening at the Louise D. Acton building.

Participants learned about physical disabilities at Wednesday's Rehab Challenge.

This was the Rehab Challenge, similar to a mini-Olympics, which took place in conjunction with Rehab Awareness Week.

Twelve teams of six participated in the event, consisting of members of the Queen's community, Royal Military College and the Kingston community.

With names like the Femme-Botts and Faculty Freaks n' Friends, the teams took part in six events which included a wheelchair obstacle course, paraplegic volleyball, and hemiplegic dressing.

Some of the other events included wheelchair basketball and astereognosis, an event where participants had to identify everyday objects while blindfolded and wearing oven mitts.

Participants in the events had to simulate a disability. In the volleyball event, they had to play the sport on the ground with their legs stretched out in front of them. In the hemiplegic dressing event, a sandbag was tied to one arm of each participant to simulate paralysis of one side of the body. Participants then had to get dressed in a certain amount of time.

Keith Tam, vice-president external of the Rehabilitation Society, was one of the organizers of the event and a past participant. "The goal of the challenge is to get people to realize what it's like to be disabled," he said. Tam participated in his first year at Queen's and in his second year helped run the event.

Tam said the event's goal is to raise awareness within the community of what living with a disability is really like.

"When I did it in first year I noticed a lot of the little things you don't notice," said Tam. "Like opening doors in a wheelchair. I noticed that there are a lot of simple things we take for granted."

The Rehab Challenge has been happening at Queen's for the past 10 years, Tam said.

'Positive meeting'

The AMS has voiced its intentions to remedy the issues. "We are willing to spend whatever we need too to fix the problem for everyone," said Sarah Armstrong, AMS Services Director.

The fate of the pub was decided yesterday afternoon when grad students, administration and pub management met to discuss the situation. Decisions were made to reopen the QP under regular hours of operation.

The pub management has made some short-term concessions to lower the noise. Among these concessions, music will cease and the main doors will be closed by 11 p.m. on weeknights and midnight on the weekends. As well, all live entertainment will be temporarily suspended.

In dealing with the situation, the QP will also give a Queen's engineering class the chance to remedy the problem and gain some consulting experience.

"I feel this was a positive meeting," said Picketts. "Everyone involved is working for a win-win situation, and I think we can attain that."

The QP hopes to return to normal operation shortly, Picketts said.

Due to continued noise problems the Queen's Pub has been temporarily closed

We are working very hard at resolving these problems and hope to reach a solution that makes everyone happy

Principal for a day

By JOANNA SHARP

Ever wonder what it's like to spend a day in someone else's shoes? Jennifer Wilson knows.

The fourth-year Queen's philosophy student and the Principal of the university got to experience a day in each other's lives as participants in the fourth annual "Principal For A Day."

Organized by the Student Team on Alumni Relations, "Principal For A Day" allows one Queen's student the opportunity to trade places with Principal William Leggett. The student spends one day acting alongside Leggett and Leggett spends one day accompanying the student to classes, taking notes and participating in class discussions.

Wilson's name was drawn from a raffle on October 20. On October 22, Wilson accompanied Leggett to his office.

"I thought it was really enlightening," said Wilson. "I had underestimated what a difficult job being Principal really was." Wilson chaired the beginning of a meeting, met with the vice-principals and spoke with the Chairman of the Board of Trustees.

"Who knew I would have won. I only bought one raffle ticket," she said. Leggett said he was enthusiastic about having a student participate in administrative affairs. "There is nothing secret about what we do. This is a good opportunity for a student to be aware of the decisions that we make and how they affect everyone," Leggett said.

On Tuesday, Leggett accompanied Wilson to her Philosophy of Law lecture. "I really enjoyed the lecture," said Leggett, "I think this exercise is a great way to get a student's perspective of Queen's. It really helps to root you in the quality of education that takes place at this university."

STAR's coordinator Laurie McMann said she was also very pleased with the outcome.

"Principal Leggett is known for being in touch with his students. He was very enthusiastic about this event," McMann said. "The fact that he can take time out of his busy day to participate in this event shows how committed he is to his students."

Principal Leggett makes for a keen student, as Jennifer Wilson and philosophy students look on.

Honour the fallen

Take up our quarrel with the foe:
To you from failing hands we throw
The Torch; be yours to hold it high.
— Flanders Field

THE TORCH SEEMS TO DIM every year, as fewer and fewer veterans are around to act as tangible reminders of the sacrifices that were made in the great wars of this century. For many of our generation, war is something broadcast live on CNN or relived through documentaries; horrible in its destructiveness, but not something that actively touches our lives. It is imperative, however, that we not lose sight of how much was sacrificed in war so that we could have the peace and security we take for granted today.

No matter who the foe, or the reason for going to war, we should all honour the many brave men and women who fought and died for their country and their ideals. With fewer veterans alive to speak of the horrors of World War I, World War II and the Korean War, we must not allow their courage to go unrecognized, lest we forget and history repeat itself.

Beyond remembering those who fell in battle, we must not forget the veterans who continue to suffer for their memories and experiences of war. Every year on November 11, we wear a red poppy to remember, but also to show that we share in their deep sadness.

No matter who the foe, or the reason for going to war, we should all honour the many brave men and women who fought and died for their country and their ideals.

It's also important that we not remember those who fell in war at the expense of those whom they fought. Remembrance Day is a powerful reminder that war is tragic for all who fight, and that all are equal in death, friend and former foe alike.

Next Wednesday, those who sacrificed will be recognized in a ceremony in Grant Hall. For those at Queen's who cannot attend, observe the moment of silence and hold the torch high.

Jays going nowhere

INTERVIEW SA, THE BELGIAN company that owns the Blue Jays, should realize that SkyDome, which has in recent years become a white elephant, is more likely to go belly-up than give in to the team's demands to renegotiate a better lease. Faced with a debt of nearly $70 million and rumours that it may file for court protection from creditors, the stadium has no room to negotiate with interview.

Instead of recognizing this reality, however, the company surprised many last week when it announced the team may move back to Exhibition Stadium. Already slated for demolition, the decrepit old ballpark is not fit these days for a minor-league team, let alone the Toronto Blue Jays. Located along the chilly lakeshore, the stadium has already been stripped-down and most observers agree that its future is more in tune with wrecking balls than baseballs.

Since interview must realize that moving into Exhibition is not a viable option for next season, the threat appears to be more of a clumsy ruse than a reasonable negotiating tactic. Whatever legitimacy the company's demands may have had went right out the window when they made this ridiculous announcement.

Interview can strut around like a peacock and make all the threats it wants, ultimately the Jays will return to Skydome next season, because for the present they have no other choice.

The Right way

THE DISAPPOINTMENT ON Wednesday was tangible. While the GOP did not lose very much at first glance, only five seats in the House and one governorship, the lack of 1994-like gains is a stinging slap in the face to a party giddy with excitement over the prospect of riding the Clinton/Lewinsky scandal back into the White House. The Republican campaign strategy revolved around a simple precept — that we have entered an era of unbridled attacks on personal morality, sexual McCarthyism and an alarming lack of governmental restraint.

We have entered an era of unbridled attacks on personal morality.

What began as a renewal of conservative ideology in the face of strong Democratic government in the early 1990s has descended into a fanatical Puritan movement. Kenneth W. Starr's gratuitous and politically biased report on President Clinton's wrong-doings confirm that the neo-conservative movement has lost sight of the principles it used to define itself by: modesty, restraint and privacy. The Starr report is clearly intended not to pursue legal impropriety but lay the foundation for a moral inquiry into the heart of the American left. This is not a moral issue, or even a political one, beyond the very obvious; Starr's actions are indicative of a kulturkampf between the New Right and the established centre.

Beginning with the collapse of anti-communist sentiment in America and the dissipation of Reaganism that ended the eighties, the right embarked on a radical intellectual reconstruction. The resulting neo orthodoxy has very little in common with the relatively mild conservatism of the seventies and eighties, but marks itself as being only mildly skeptical of governmental power, wildly pessimistic and calls for much greater forms of social control. William Kristol, certainly one of the most outspoken and influential of the new conservatism's intelligentsia, recently called for conservatives to expose homosexuality as "the disease that it is," advocating a spiritual and psychoanalytic "cure" for homosexuals. An obsession with Puritanical morality has replaced political virtue as the issue of prime importance in Kristol's view. How else could one reasonably expect Bill Clinton's term as President to end because of infidelity despite his sterling international reputation, unprecedented among his predecessors? An international reputation anchored by the President's integral role in the drafting of Peace Accords in Northern Ireland and Israel, two of the 20th-century's most volatile and unstable regions.

Bill Clinton will certainly be remembered as a great president, but a person of questionable character. He may also be remembered as a victim of a puritanical witch-hunt that would plunge American civilization into a type of anti-libertine morass not seen since Joseph McCarthy's reign of terror. Thankfully, American voters bought a stay of execution with a firm dismissal of the GOP's moral accusations. The real war will be fought in 2000, when the next president, and the moral direction of the United States, will be determined.

Unmasking the hate

I LOVE HALLOWE'EN. It's the only time of year where I really let loose; become somebody new.

This year was no different. Armed with "rented" costumes from Le Chateau, my best buddy and I set out to conquer the night as "The Roxbury Boys." We looked mighty fine, complete with polyester pants and shirts as well as kick-ass replica silver chains. We went from house to house belly-bumping as many friends would, while rhythmically bobbing our heads to Haddaway's "What is Love."

What should have been a perfect night was anything but. Little did I know that my flamboyant outfit would allow me to gain a new perspective on persecution and discrimination — something I've never experienced from my North Toronto perspective.

"Hey, there's a couple of faggots!" somebody yelled as my friend and I were between stops on a house crawl. At first, I was certain they were not talking about in the middle of University Avenue. Aside from the inevitable beating, it would have thrown a major wrench in our plan to return our beautiful, yet highly flammable, outfits.

After our little encounter, I was shocked to say the least. I've always believed that the student body here at Queen's has been more or less enlightened. How naive I was. Not only were these idiots stuck somewhere in the time of black leather jackets and "Brille Cream," but I was also shown just how unenlightened I was. I honestly didn't believe that this type of persecution occurred in my environment, against my friends, in my community.

Recently, a gay college student named Matthew Shepard was pummeled during a robbery and left to die lashed to a fence outside of Laramie, Wyoming. The two men charged with killing Shepard, Russell Henderson, 21, and Aaron McKinney, 22, made anti-gay remarks after they allegedly lured Shepard from a bar, then pistol-whipped him with the but of a .357 magnum and left him in an isolated rural area in subfreezing temperatures.

I can imagine that the last words Matthew Shepard heard before he lost consciousness, and ultimately his life, were similar to those shouted at my friend and I in the ghetto on Saturday night. Where I once dismissed the tragedy that happened in Wyoming as an isolated incident perpetrated by two unus. But as we continued on University Avenue the comments persisted and we were confronted.

"Looks like two fags out for a night on the town," spewed the tallest of the bunch. This barrage continued for some time as I stood there in shock. Finally, having gathered my thoughts, I asked one of the eight lowlifes: "Are we going to have to fight you guys, or what?" (Not because I wanted to fight, but rather to be prepared if it was inevitable.) The response was "No" and that the oaf now accusing my friend was "drunk and didn't know what he was doing."

"Hey, there's a couple of faggots!" somebody yelled as my friend and I were between stops on a house crawl.

We went our separate ways and I've got to tell you that I was pretty happy that my buddy and I didn't have to "throw 'em" with eight drunk hooligans

Princess Court long troubled

Dear Editors,

The article on the Princess Court Cinema in Friday's Journal was incorrect in identifying Shane Magee as the owner of the theatre. He, in fact, was employed as the Executive Director. In that position, he carried out the orders of the Board of Directors, who were elected by the membership (the shareholders). It was not due to his planning that the Princess Court Cinema closed its doors.

Although the article speculates that Shane made stupid decisions in regards to programming the theatre, the reality was a bit more complex than that. Originally, Alliance representatives made a deal to allow the cinema to pay back the money owed them by showing more popular Alliance products. However, the Atlantis Alliance merger silenced those representatives, who understandably feared that any risks they took would cost them their jobs in the following restructuring. Consequently, the deal was not carried through and programming became a nightmare. Shane tried to show such films as Smoke Signals and Pi onscreen since before they were even released, but the merger got in the way.

The death of the Princess Court Cinema was the conclusion to a long, ten-year struggle. In the clean up, members of the Board discovered an issue of PIC Press from around 1991 that devoted an entire issue to the struggle of the Cinema. The problems named in that issue are the ones that continued to dog the cinema until it closed. The decreasing amount of available government grant money, the rise of video, the public's diminishing interest in alternative films and the Canadian distribution system's willingness to be colonized by Hollywood interests all contributed to the fall of the Princess Court Cinema. In the end, this out-weighted the contributions of concerned members of the Kingston community, which included a core audience, other Hub businesses and even the Chamber of Commerce.

Over the years, in a desperate attempt to break even, the Cinema began to whittle away at the aspects of the Cinema that made it unique, while the audience consistently dropped fifteen percent a year. When the public's interest failed and the distributor's interest turned to other things, the Cinema no longer had the resources to survive. The Princess Court Cinema joins the ranks of three other alternative cinemas in Ontario and Nova Scotia, fatally wounded by a shifting industry.

As a member of the Board of Directors for almost two years and as a Film student, I find the Princess Court Cinema's demise to be saddening. The employees were kind and courteous, the films ranged from the sublime to the gloriously ridiculous and the audience, whether it was two or one hundred, enjoyed itself. Despite the difficult demise of the cinema, I do know that there are people in Kingston who are committed to watching, discussing and furthering "alternative" cinema. It is still possible and still rewarding, you just have to work harder.

QEA a few steps behind

Dear Editors,

I am writing in response to misleading information presented by the article entitled "QEA in the game." (Nov 1)

While the list of previous performers the QEA has booked is impressive, an important point is neglected: some of these bands appeared at Frosh Week concerts to which upper year students are denied access.

Additionally, while there are many aspects that enter into the booking of a band, I believe that the QEA has already made two mistakes this year. First, a recent Heuvos Rancheros concert was scheduled at Alfie's on the same night as a Big Sugar concert at AJ's and (as noted by a Journal reporter) the QEA concert was consequently sparsely attended.

Such details should not be overlooked by the QEA, even if it was the only possible night the band was available. Second, the Canadian band Pure was recently on a tour of Canada, specifically Ontario, and failed to make a stop in Kingston.

Although I am unaware of the exact cost of booking such a band, I am aware that there were October nights that the band was free and I also highly doubt that the show would have been a bad investment.

Finally, despite the QEA's claim of wanting to 'diversify,' they actually appear to be simply jumping on the swing and/or hip-hop bandwagons, ignoring concerts that would have been welcomed by many students.

Quality check

Dear Editors,

You clearly need an Opinions Editor! After reading the single Opinions article in November 3rd Edition of The Journal, "Racism within us, around us" by Andrew Toms, I was highly disappointed to find no 'opinion' within the article whatsoever.

I am surprised that you have allowed a writer to use The Journal as little more than a medium through which his personal anger can be vented over disappearing posters. Taking a wild stab in the dark of course, but I get the distinct impression it was indeed Mr. Toms himself who put up those posters and therefore felt personally denigrated by their removal. Right or wrong as this conclusion may be, Mr. Toms has finally got his way by reproducing several thousand copies of the Burma poster within The Journal — a medium which certainly can't be removed by 'poster punks.' It is a pity however, that he offers no opinion over what is an extremely serious situation in Burma.

He does do a good job though, of patronizing us readers. Any literate person who is able to sense tone in an article, would assume quite early on that this has been written by a Caucasian. The use of the phrase "reverse racism" only adds to the astonishment of being told in the most subtle way of the writer's skin colour.

Finally, I find his remarks at the end of article have the effect of detracting from the issue, rather than making students aware. Mr. Toms offers nothing new on this subject and simultaneously does a good job of belittling the entire issue.

On a lighter note may I commend the excellent article on Swissair Flight 111. Mr. Toms suggests we all attend an OPIRG workshop on anti-oppression. Two counter suggestions: Features run a workshop on journalism; Mr. Toms attends it. Of course, you will understand however, this is only my opinion.

Generalizations of racism perilous

Dear Editors,

Allow me to step into the ring and put forth my humble opinion. Although racism is certainly a problem, it is not "alive and well" as demonstrated by the two instances put in Andrew Tom's Opinions article "Racism within us, around us."

Might I suggest that it is exactly this McCarthyist witch-hunt that is creating the problem.

While the second point mentioned is obviously ignorant and hurtful, it is probably nothing short of the rantings of one seriously misguided individual. There is sick, profane stuff written in the stalls of the washrooms of this university and one bigot does not mean that "perverse, systemic" racism is alive and well at Queen's.

The first instance of racism in your article I find puzzling. Could it possibly be that the posters were not torn down because the face on them is asian? Perhaps they are larger than average and were singled out for this reason, to make room for more poster space. Or maybe someone didn't agree with the political statement on them. I think it's telling that you immediately jump to the conclusion of racism to explain what could have easily been caused by a dozen of other reasons. The editorial that appeared in The Journal after the QP poster fiasco is another prime example of political correctness gone haywire. Pointing the finger at Mr. Thompson for apologizing was hypocritical and counter-productive. It was not the apology that stifled intelligent debate on the matter, it was the suggestion of racial insensitivity by the author of the editorial. No one will want to discuss this matter if they are afraid of being blacklisted as a racist. I am aware that these statements are reason enough for my public lynching at the hands of the more socially aware. But might I suggest that it is exactly this McCarthyist witch-hunt that is creating the problem. Allow me to make a proposal that will allow intelligent debate on racism instead of stifling it. Choose your battles more carefully Mr. Toms. By screaming "racism!" at every opportunity, you'll be just like the boy who cried wolf and no one will listen to you when something really bad actually happens.

Let's get to the heart of the matter

Dear Editors,

It is quite simple. The caricatures shown on the now infamous QP ad campaign were insulting to the sensibilities of many people of African descent. The QP management acknowledged this. Queen's policy prohibits the publication of images of its kind, and Nalini Naidoo and those who wrote to The Journal before her stated these points simply and succinctly. However, it now seems that

FOR THOSE OF YOU who dream of having a big chest, a tiny waistline and a small behind, get in line! The truth is, although many North American women would love to be well-proportioned in all the right places, few of us are blessed with an hourglass figure. Consequently, most of us surrender ourselves to padded bras which "fill with cotton what God has forgotten," high-cut underwear to suck in "protruding guts," high-heeled shoes to enhance our height, and other ridiculous material things to transform ourselves from what we look like to what we want to look like.

This struggle continues and women of all ages continue to suffer from mild to extreme eating disorders.

We are surrounded by an idea of the "perfect" woman. Whether we find her in a magazine, on television, or on a billboard posted on a bus; at least once a day, we are encircled by this perceived idea of how we "should" look. But how do we define a "perfect" woman? Why have we not conceded that there is no such thing?

The media has a significant influence on our ideals. Through the way they advertise their propaganda, they can positively and negatively influence, brainwash, and manipulate people's ideas.

Waif models are used by worldwide known designers such as Calvin Klein, Gucci, Christian Dior, along with hundreds of other designers, who expose these young models half-naked to promote their overpriced products. Many of these models have yet to hit puberty and the minority that have, starve themselves to look good.

This is not to say that there are not naturally slender women in the modelling industry, because they are; however, many of them live malnourished and may suffer from a series of eating disorders. So I've decided that if I have to starve myself and get implants to fit into their "perfect" criteria, they're out of their minds. They'll just have to ignore one more small-chested, big hipped, average-sized woman who knows how she looks and likes it!

The sad thing is that most of us, although aware of these issues, still strive to look like them. We exercise like crazy, we're constantly watching what we eat, we buy low-fat foods, and go on ridiculous diets. We smoke; we drink, and all of this for what? To prevent ourselves from looking the way we naturally look. It seems to me we can be just as irrational and glib as those models since many people still believe that in order to be beautiful, you have to be thin.

We have been socialized by this idea of being thin; and while some of us naturally acquire this trend, most of us are not built to fit into a size 4.

If we compare this to the rumoured size 16 Marilyn Monroe wore in the 1950s, we can see how dissimilar social trends were in those times. Women did not have to live up to this idea of being slender, but were rather admired when they were voluptuous and healthy-looking; as opposed to this waif-look trend.

Although many now insist that the waif-look trend is out and the muscular, healthy-looking trend is in, the ideal of being thin is still very much indirectly present and promoted.

I believe women should not have to live up to any sort of "ideal" image. They should feel comfortable with their own bodies, regardless of their size, and should not base beauty and its meaning on the image the media happens to be marketing this year.

This obsession with being thin is the leading cause to contracting eating disorders among young women and to lowering their self-esteem. A psychological study in 1995 found that three minutes spent looking at models in a fashion magazine caused 70 per cent of women to feel depressed, guilty and shameful.

What I don't understand is why even after we spend ridiculous amounts of money learning about proper nourishment and ways to improve our lifestyle we continue to torture ourselves through this ongoing obsession of wanting to look thin.

This struggle continues, and women of all ages continue to suffer from mild to extreme eating disorders; some even undergo emotional imbalances.

People in today's society are corrupted into the belief that you cannot be beautiful unless you fit the supermodel criteria. My question is, how can someone fix the limits of beauty based on a lanky, airbrushed model on the cover of a magazine?

The fact that anyone would think about defining beauty in such way makes me reflect on just how warped our society has become and how negatively it affects the image of women.

So I've decided that if I have to starve myself and get implants to fit into their "perfect" criteria, they're out of their minds. They'll just have to ignore one more small-chested, big hipped, average-sized woman who knows how she looks and likes it!

YES

I THINK IT'S FAIR TO SAY that Queen's University has undergone a substantial amount of change over the last four years.

$400 million has been cut from post-secondary education; tuition fees have risen by over 40 per cent; these fee increases have not covered the revenue shortfall — so total resources available have declined; law and medicine programs now have deregulated fees; student aid has not been reformed in order to mitigate the effects of these tuition increases. Indeed, the accessibility of our universities, and consequently their utility, is in jeopardy.

It's time to make this change. And right now, the opportunity exists.

Queen's students' response to this change can be characterized, I believe, as reasonable but frustrated, and during this time period the Alma Mater Society has continued to forward the very reasonable concerns of its members to all levels of governance. Unfortunately, the broader provincial student movement in which this has occurred has been splintered and divided. Student group A, student group B, "unaligned" students... all clamouring for what they think is right for them. Is it possible to believe that any government would really listen to a lone pack of 11,000 students lost in the din of competing special interest groups?

Historically, many major concessions gained from government have come as the result of group co-operation. It's not rocket science — it's strength in numbers. It's time we learned to find the intersection of interests and resources among students that can be pooled together to achieve real results.

It's time to make this change. And right now, the opportunity exists. The Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance is an organization which has the potential to effect real change in the way post-secondary education is treated in this province. Costing $1.95 per student to join, OUSA's membership is comprised of Ontario universities like Western, Waterloo, Brock, Windsor, the University of Toronto part-time students, McMaster and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. These schools amount to over 120,000 students across Ontario. It is these schools, populated by students facing the same issues and who hold the same viewpoints, that draft reasoned, principled policies. Policies whose keystone is the maintenance of high quality education at a reasonable cost, with adequate financial assistance for those who require it.

This kind of member-driven policy creation has led to increased credibility for OUSA. Since its inception — in which Queen's played a part — in 1992, OUSA has established itself as a reasonable, credible organization. This means it is often called on to deliver opinions to government officials, all political parties, the Council of Ontario Universities and other important stakeholders in post-secondary education. It has also established itself within the Ministry of Education and Training bureaucracy, and demonstrated an ability to build coalitions between all these groups.

The best evidence of such influence lies in two of the major victories that OUSA has engineered: the establishment of an ancillary fee protocol to prevent back-door deregulation of tuition, and the recent creation of the Ontario Advisory Committee on Student Financial Aid. OACSA's implementation is a success of particular note. This initiative evolved over a short six months and was agreed to by a government that has demonstrated its ability to refuse input from concerned parties. Most importantly, OACSA's membership is comprised of every stakeholder in post-secondary education.

These are the kind of results that can grow from sharing research and resources. These are the kind of results that can grow from the consistent, well-articulated lobbying of reasoned positions that OUSA facilitates. These are the kind of results that can grow from united, well-organized alliances.

Indeed, this is the crux of the issue: we will never be able to affect government alone the same way we can in a group. Consistent and substantial positive change in post-secondary education will come only once we recognize that we can't change the system by ourselves.

This is the issue that Queen's student must face on November 10th and 11th when they vote on whether to or not to align with OUSA. On whether or not they believe that $1.95 is worth a stronger voice to government. On whether or not they owe it to both themselves, and future Queen's students.

NO

STUDENTS WILL SOON DECIDE whether to resume membership in the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance.

The drive to leave OUSA in 1995 was initiated by myself and others over OUSA's policies and tactics, specifically the demand for a 30 per cent tuition increase in exchange for more government funding to universities and the creation of an Income Contingent Loan Repayment Plan.

We believed that asking for a tuition increase was a dangerous risk and that the faith OUSA showed and continues to show in ICLRP was misguided. ICLRP is a system of debt management which, through the wonders of compound interest, insures that those who earn the least in material terms from their education pay the most. While an AMS annual general meeting voted to leave OUSA, this was due to financial concerns rather than a rejection of OUSA's policies.

OUSA was founded according to the notion that if students accepted an added responsibility for the cost of post-secondary education, government would put more resources into universities.

This approach was a disaster. Gareth Park, policy assistant from 1993 to 1995 to Education Minister Dave Cooke argues that OUSA's creation and "the splitting of the student movement was the reason government was able to get away with tuition increases" with little resistance.

OUSA's offer to accept a tuition increase of 30 per cent in exchange for greater government investment was "a gamble that didn't pay off," says Park, who also argues that OUSA was "there as a divider, I don't think they had any significant clout (with the government) other than the fact that they were useful to have around."

Between 1992 and 1995 the NDP increased tuition by approximately 50 per cent with minimal political cost. While OUSA got the tuition increase they asked for they failed to get government to put more money into education.

ICLRP was rejected by the NDP as inequitable, the federal government rejected this year as financially unworkable and the Harris government has been unable to implement it largely because the banks reject it as unfeasible.

ICLRP is a pie-in-the-sky concept, a sop to try to make tuition increases more acceptable to students.

OUSA's tactics are premised on an essential misunderstanding, the belief that government can be persuaded by reason. In the real world lobbyists have influence either because they represent money and power or because they are able to make a government's life difficult by mobilizing a large constituency. OUSA fails on both these counts.

OUSA seems to better serve the interests of student leaders than of students. While former OUSA executive director Barry McCarten was able to get himself a job with the Harris government, OUSA has achieved precious little for students.

We can see here at Queen's that the activist model, when employed properly, has been more successful than the schmoozing approach.

Rather than perpetuating the split in the student movement the AMS should be trying to bring student governments together by navigating a median course between OUSA and CFS.

While student government leaders are dismissive of student mobilization, we can see here at Queen's that the activist model, when employed properly, has been more successful than the schmoozing approach.

In 1997 the AMS executive led by Maynard Plant was able to build a coalition which mobilized over 1,000 students to rally for a tuition freeze. Over 600 students marched silently through Senate to this end and Senate defeated a tuition freeze motion by a relatively slim margin of 20-14. The next year, the Senate Budget Review Committee, influenced by this manifestation of student anger, voted for a tuition freeze. By the time this recommendation made it to Senate in 1998 the AMS had largely abandoned their briefly held belief in student mobilization and the motion of a tuition freeze was soundly beaten.

With the AMS becoming increasingly committed to rejoining OUSA we've seen an abandonment of attempts to meaningfully include the wider student population in attempts to influence and a return to an elite leadership model. For students to retake ownership and control of the tuition issue it is necessary for them to reject OUSA.

the discussion has degenerated to the point that a person who expressed a strong opinion on the issue of racism is accused of being "intellectually condescending and self-aggrandizing" (Ken Hawkins, Oct. 27, The Journal).

The QP matter is not about cartoons. It is about stereotypes and trying to function in a society that is guided by these stereotypes. It is about being judged and evaluated against a false standard of "blackness." It is about being misrepresented, under-represented and in all other ways maligned. It is about continuing the civil rights battles of centuries past. Our parents fought for the right to be recognized as individual human beings in the law books. Now we are fighting to be thought of as individual human beings.

It is our sincere hope that this QP poster affair will prove to be this beginning of something positive.

Mr. Hawkins' letter was disturbing to say the least. First, he referred to the pressure applied on the QP management to account for its lapse in good judgement as a "witch-hunt." Furthermore, he suggested that those of us who take a strong stand on the issue are "militant advocates of hypersensitivity" who will "persecute" those whose views might not agree with ours. These strong allegations are a barrier to any helpful discourse on racism.

It is impossible to have complete agreement on any issue, let alone an issue as contentious as racism. We do not tell you to believe what we believe nor see what we see because on a fundamental level, you cannot. We welcome all alternate perspectives, according them all due respect, with the expectation that the same consideration will be given in return. In addition, if we are to have a productive dialogue on racism, we cannot have exchanges based on how we feel about the "tone of a letter" or throw words haphazardly without thinking about their implications.

This letter is not meant to stigmatize Mr. Hawkins or those who feel as he does. However, we could not let the issues he raised go unanswered. It is our sincere hope that this QP poster affair will prove to be this beginning of something positive. We invite all Queen's students to join us in taking an honest assessment of these issues of race and culture, in Queen's and in Canada.

Waterloo and OUSA: the inside scoop

Dear Editors,

I want to take the opportunity to respond to Mr. Lehrer's letter from your Oct. 30 issue. It is indeed correct that the University of Waterloo Federation of Students (FEDS) changed its membership status from full member to associate member on Sept. 30th. The negotiations for this change were held confidentially amongst OUSA Steering Committee members, which is why the AMS could not have been aware of the change.

The FEDS were concerned coming into this year about the past performance of OUSA. We had questions about the financial status of OUSA, the commitment of its member schools, communication between head office and member schools, the lack of policy production, and bad past decisions, including those which led Queen's to leave OUSA.

We wanted to send a message to OUSA that it would have to improve its performance in order for us to continue our membership. We believe this message was well received and OUSA and its members have acted on our concerns. There has been improvement in most of our areas of concern as outlined to OUSA earlier this year.

Whether or not the FEDS will return to full member status in OUSA is a question to be answered by our Students' Council on Dec. 6. I can say with confidence, however, that OUSA has responded well to our call for improvement. Furthermore, the addition of Queen's to the fold would be a strong benefit to OUSA and make returning to full member status a much more attractive option to the FEDS.

Undergrads bear costs of Who's Where

Dear Editors,

We write this letter to explain the AMS position regarding distribution of the Who's Where to graduate students and law students.

Our position is founded in part upon the assertion that there is no current, binding services agreement between the AMS and the SGPS. The last agreement, signed in 1993, explicitly expired in 1996. No subsequent agreement has ever been reached between the two societies. It is true that the SGPS has been paying certain service-specific fees to the AMS. However, it is also true that SGPS members are using those services for which they pay a fee.

In response to those who have suggested that the AMS is behaving in a mean-spirited and petty manner, we will outline the reasoning of the AMS Executive and Board of Directors. The Who's Where is a publication that costs the AMS, net of advertising, about $2 a book to create. Undergraduate students pay a portion of this cost when they buy a What's Next, which makes a profit. Any remaining loss on the Who's Where is made up by undergraduate students when they pay their mandatory AMS student fees. Neither the Executive nor the Board could condone providing an identical service to non-AMS members at a lower cost than is incurred upon members. Such a position would be untenable in principle and unfair to those who belong to the AMS.

The fact that the AMS has provided the Who's Where to graduate students free of charge in the past is significant, despite the fact that we believe it was mistaken. Because of the reasonable expectations that were built up due to past practice, the AMS will provide the Who's Where to graduate students for $2 per copy, an amount equal to the cost that we incur on each book. This is much reduced from the $7 fee that the AMS charges other non-members. All graduate students and law students can now purchase a copy of the Who's Where at the AMS Infobank or the UBS Exchange.

Throughout the process, our goal is to provide services that students want in an economical and fair manner. If you disagree with this idea or don't believe that our actions match this principle, please email us at vpop@ams.queensu.ca or board@ams.queensu.ca.

Housing by-laws misrepresented

Dear Editors,

I am writing to clarify some important points which were garbled in The Journal's November 3 article "Students encouraged to winterize homes."

Firstly, The Journal invented a fictional piece of legislation called the "Kingston Landlord-Tenant Act." Landlord-tenant relations are governed at the provincial level by the Tenant Protection Act which took effect on June 17th of this year. The legislation to which The Journal was actually referring is the Property Standards by-law for the City of Kingston. Property standards are governed at the municipal level and the by-law dictates the minimum standards for accommodations in Kingston.

Secondly, although insulation for homes is not included in the Property Standards by-law, there are minimum standards relating to heating and heat loss. While landlords are not responsible for replacing drafty doors and windows they are, under the Property standards by-law, responsible for eliminating major drafts and ensuring the unit is adequately heated. Panes of glass with large cracks around doors should be filled. According to the by-law, the heating system itself shall "be capable of maintaining a temperature of 70 degrees from 6 a.m. to 11 p.m. and 66 degrees at other times."

The by-law addresses concerns that many students have about their homes. Students have the right to ask their landlords to bring their homes up to the standards outlined above. Any student with a question about their home is invited to call the Municipal Affairs Commission at 545-6000 ext. 5178 for a free property standards evaluation.

El Niño's sister our next worry

By BOON CHANG

IF CURRENT PREDICTIONS hold true, Queen's students should look for this coming winter to be one of harshest and most frigid in years. La Niña, the counterpart of last year's El Niño, is expected to contribute to lower temperatures and increased snowfall in Eastern Ontario, as well as major changes in the global climate.

Queen's students are all-too-familiar with last January's devastating weather. El Niño exhibited itself, in part at least, in the form of Ice Storm '98. For more than a week, residents in Eastern Ontario and Southern Quebec were forced from their homes when waves of freezing rain pulled down trees and power lines.

But what really is an El Niño and how does it affect the weather so much? According to Harry McCaughey, a professor with the department of geography at Queen's, El Niño is "a collection of warmer than normal water in the tropical eastern Pacific." This unusual warm water starts on the west coast of the Americas and creeps westwards in the tropical zone of the Pacific. McCaughey also says that El Niño is "feature of the atmospheric circulation" that has "as long a history as we know of."

What this means is that even though El Niño was particularly severe this year, this phenomenon has been cycling through the atmosphere for hundreds of years and will continue to do so. Although the causes of El Niño are not exactly known, we know it is associated with the Southern Oscillation, a fluctuation in air pressure from the eastern and western Pacific. By examining the change in this pressure gradient, it is possible to predict when an El Niño is going to occur.

There is a connection between air pressure and ocean currents and the presence or absence of warm water on the ocean surface. Picture a band of the Pacific along the coast of Central America from California to Peru that stretches across to Indonesia and Northern Australia. Normally, the trade winds blow from the east to the west, but with the Southern Oscillation comes a decrease in these winds. The water below no longer moves as fast as it usually does and is thus warmed by the sun.

El Niño acts by changing weather patterns, most affecting regions directly to the east of that zone of hot water, such as Peru, Central America, Southern California, Florida and Texas. Canada and the Northern U.S. are also affected. Although the effects are global, "it doesn't change everything," says McCaughey. "It changes some things more than others, in different parts of the world, for somewhat different reasons."

Possible effects include increased precipitation, a greater occurrence of storms or more dry weather, depending on the location. This past year, for instance, the drought in Indonesia from El Niño brought tremendous forest fires. El Niño has also been blamed for the increased rainfall in Southern California, the storms in Texas and the hurricanes along the Florida coast.

But to what extent can we blame El Niño for the weather? Has El Niño affected climate in Canada to the point where it is responsible, or are we just using it as a scapegoat? "I think a lot of people who don't understand what El Niño really is tend to react and say everything that isn't normal is because of El Niño... and it might not be the case," says McCaughey. "It doesn't cause everything. It has been overgeneralized, but this is normal and it happens all the time. I think we're all to blame for not talking and thinking about it and explaining ourselves to the public to make people really see what these things are and what they're about."

All this leads to the question: Was last January's ice storm really an effect of El Niño? McCaughey doesn't think so. "I don't think you can prove a cause and effect relationship between the ice storm and El Niño," he says. "I think it's highly likely that El Niño was somehow involved, but I think the unique circumstances that caused the ice storm weren't necessarily connected to El Niño alone. There were other things that happened that caused the ice storm to be so severe. It was a factor, but not the only factor."

McCaughey believes the ice storm last year was caused by a set of "special circumstances." These included the input of warm air by El Niño in the Pacific, but the fact that the storm persisted for so long shows it was also influenced by the high pressure of the Atlantic and a layer of cold air from the St. Lawrence Valley. This year, it is La Niña that will influence Kingston's weather. While El Niño is a body of very warm water in the Pacific Ocean, La Niña is the later occurrence of much colder water in the same area. When an El Niño diminishes and eventually disappears, there is generally a return to the normal, cooler circulation that tends to be more accentuated. "It's like spreading a big cold puddle across the Pacific," explains McCaughey. In Canada, El Niño caused a winter that was warmer than normal and dryness in the prairies. This year, La Niña is expected to cause a much colder winter, and more precipitation in the prairies. In Eastern Ontario, it should be colder than last year, and we should have more snow.

The question is: Are we likely to get another ice storm this winter? Although an ice storm of the same intensity seems unlikely, "ice storms are a normal feature of the circulation of this part of the world," says McCaughey. "Freezing rain is freezing rain; you get it several times a winter. Last January just happened to be so incredibly heavy. It exceeded all the limits that we had expected."

Either way, ice storm or not, the best bet is to keep an eye out for colder weather and to bundle up as much as possible.

Losing the war on bugs

By ANDREW PARKER

"Any attempt to shape the world and modify human personality in order to create a self-chosen pattern of life involves many unknown consequences. Human destiny is bound to remain a gamble, because at some unpredictable time and in some unforeseeable manner nature will strike back."

— Rene Dubos

The year is 1928, and Alexander Fleming, returning to his disheveled lab in London discovers a compound that would forever change the field of medicine. He looks through his microscope and discovers penicillin. This drug had the ability to purge the body of infections that had plagued mankind for thousands of years, and yet even from the inception of human testing, researchers noticed one small problem. Penicillin didn't always work. Eerily foreshadowing things to come, one patient in the initial test group died from a drug resistant strep infection. That was only the beginning.

Seventy years later, doctors have at their disposal an arsenal of more than 100 antibiotics, products of a golden era when the magic pill reigned supreme and experts believed that the problem of infectious disease was quite simply solved. Of course, drug resistant bacteria were ever increasing their numbers, but few paid any attention, and those who did firmly believed that antibiotic production would continue to remain one step ahead of the bacterial threat. The most sobering reminder of the nature's adaptive power has come most recently.

Three strains of life-threatening bacteria have developed resistance to every antibiotic known. Two of the strains are found widely in hospitals and commonly cause post-operative infections. The other resistant strain causes tuberculosis. Doctors treating this strain are just as successful as their counterparts were more than a century ago when TB epidemics struck populations all over the planet. It seems the bugs are winning, and here's why.

Our wanton use of antibiotics over the last 50 years is beginning to have dire effects, and our problems will continue to mount.

The use of antibiotics is out of control. According to the founder of the Alliance for the Prudent Use of Antibiotics, "we're in the middle of a crisis." At least half of the human use of antibiotics in the United States is unnecessary or inappropriate. This begs the question, how does such abuse of prescription drugs occur? The answer is twofold. First, many patients demand antibiotics for conditions that don't require them. Second, and most important, doctors give in and write the prescriptions that their patients demand.

At a recent physicians conference, more than 80 percent of the attending doctors admitted to prescribing antibiotics against their better judgement. It is this careless overuse that is causing the rapid production of resistant bacteria. If this trend continues, we may see a time when childhood and common infections are virtually untreatable. Although the improper use of antibiotics is part of the problem, it remains just one aspect of the current trend of wilful self-destruction.

The most pressing cause for fear is the current antibacterial fad that is taking over the common market. Everything from toothpaste to kitchen cleaners, even baby toys are loaded with antibacterial agents. This indiscriminate use of powerful chemicals threatens to make

Freeze-dried organs

Japanese researchers have developed a new method for preserving organs for transplant. New Scientist magazine reports that the method involves drying the organs with silica after they have been treated with trehalose, a sugar found naturally in microscopic organisms called tardigrades. These creatures can survive losing almost all the water in their cells and can be revived from that desiccated state after as much as 100 years.

Face/Off for real

After a French team successfully transplanted a hand from a cadaver to a live patient last month, other surgeons are getting pretty (ahem) cocky in their own claims. In yesterday's Globe and Mail, an Italian surgeon said he's more than ready to perform the first penis transplant and an American claimed that transplanting a cadaver's face, complete with facial bones and the muscles used for facial expressions, would pose little challenge.

Antibiotics overused

our homes havens of intractable disease-producing bacteria. This will occur because we will wipe out all susceptible bacteria, and give the resistant ones room to multiply. By buying into this fad, we are insuring that our common places will be inhabited by the strongest bugs that nature can produce.

Another area of concern involves the use of antibiotics in agriculture and animal farming. More than 40 per cent of the antibiotics produced in the U.S. are given to animals, and most of this is mixed in with their feed at low concentrations to promote growth. This low-level application increases the number of resistant bacteria in the animal, and increases the risk that the microbes will be passed on to the consumer.

Our wanton use of antibiotics over the last 50 years is beginning to have dire effects, and our problems will continue to mount. We must take immediate action, or we may find ourselves living in a world where once mild infections have fatal consequences. Our success or failure will not be apparent until well into the next century, but in the mean time, there are things we can do to aid the cause of humanity. We must limit antibiotic use to those cases where they are truly required. We must stop using products that facilitate the growth of resistant bacteria, and we must stop the widespread use of antibiotics in agriculture. One thing is clear. This issue must remind us that while we tread the path so carelessly into the future, we eliminate many choices along the way. There is no going back. We must choose well, or we may find ourselves standing at the edge of a great precipice, and our only choice may be to jump.

Trust me...

BY CHRISTOPHER WULF

Who can you trust?

TO WHAT EXTENT can we trust the information which is presented to us everyday? The media, like a lot of today's social institutions, has suffered a significant collapse in its morals in the late 20th century. While there have always been concerns over abuse of the media, it appears that we have now reached a new low standard. Sensationalism, editorial abuses, oligopolistic ownership patterns, all-pervasive consumerism and outright lying now plague our primary information sources. Consider a few examples:

Marlboro cigarettes, was appointed to the board of directors of Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation, the owners of 20th Century Fox and an enormous number of newspapers worldwide, there was nary an article in the popular media. That this move coincided with a renewed push by Murdoch's Star television service into China, one of the last countries in the world where tobacco consumption is rising, is strong evidence of the hazards of an insufficiently regulated industry.

Media Crook #4 —
David Black

Media Crook #1 —
Stephen Glass

STEPHEN GLASS, one of the most celebrated and in-demand journalists of the nineties, was forced to resign from his position at The New Republic amid allegations that he fabricated more than 50 per cent of his articles. Having also written for Rolling Stone, Harper's, and George, he eventually admitted to fabricating sources, anecdotes and complete incidents.

Media Crook #2 —
Bonnie Fuller

BONNIE FULLER, former editor of Marie Claire, YM and Cosmopolitan, is being accused of both directly and indirectly supporting the fabrication of quotes as she takes over editorial control at Glamour, one of the few women's magazines to win editorial content awards. According to former staff members, in an attempt to increase the sex quotient at Cosmopolitan it was considered commonplace to invent or alter quotes to provide more graphic sexual content. (But, she increased Cosmo's sales by 30 per cent so don't expect her dismissal anytime soon.)

Media Crook #3 —
Geoffrey C. Bible

WHEN GEOFFREY C. BIBLE, CEO of Philip Morris, manufacturers of conglomeration take their toll upon the media marketplace, one question whether the media can ever play its watchdog role again. Rupert Murdoch's refusal to allow his Asian news network, Star, to report on China's human rights abuses while he was negotiating access to their burgeoning communications systems, is simply another example of the editorial risk that we run in allowing international monopolies.

The Canadian media field is one of the most rapidly consolidating industries as corporations like CanWest and Conrad Black's Hollinger/Southam dominate the market. Black's print chain owns more than 50 per cent of English-Canadian newspapers, along with a large proportion of the magazine market. While, he has maintained the public perception of an arms length controller, his effect upon the editorial standpoints of his papers is achieved through many different avenues. Limiting the diversity of views in the public media can only be considered detrimental to our ability to protect the democratic process.

Consumers are now often willing to take an increasingly active role in exposing the bias in media and searching out less commercially packaged material.

"Reporters are ranked only slightly ahead of arms dealers and tobacco companies in the level of hard-core trust afforded them by the public" — Michael Posner (The Globe and Mail). What is to be done about this situation? One of the root problems of unaccountable media is that the press are primarily governed by libel laws which are simply insufficient. If the media are only accountable for burying stories which negatively concern their benefactors? Like the good samaritan laws emerging throughout North America, it should be considered equally egregious to fail to report on certain issues and to print omissions and false stories, which are becoming as costly as those instances of libel for which they are well-insured.

Today's media: more intent on showing the truth or showing a profit?

The efforts of the major media conglomerates to masquerade entertainment as information and lower the standards of journalism may well prove to be its downfall. Consumers have gotten to the point where they are frustrated with the commercial media. They are now often willing to take an increasingly active role in exposing the bias in media and searching out less commercially packaged material.

TO WHOM SHOULD THE MEDIA-SAVVY consumer turn for legitimate, honest reporting and entertainment? Long the subject of magazines such as Adbusters and Mother Jones, the question is increasingly being answered by a new breed of responsible media. The summer launch of Brill's Content, a magazine edited by Steven Brill, caused a major uproar in traditional media outlets as, in a 27,000 word piece, he thrashed the new school of journalism which has risen out of the "paparazification" of the media. Brill, who founded the now infamous Court TV, is attempting to establish himself as a missionary for "The Independent Voice of the Information Age."

Brill's Content seems to be well on its way to achieving its mandate. Despite an initial flurry of claims of bias (Brill once donated money to a democratic re-election campaign), the magazine has proven itself relatively fearless in its attempts to rouse the watchdog. Having already attacked network television, the book publishing industry, and even the old guard of The Wall Street Journal, LA Times, and The Economist, Brill's hopes of more responsible media may not be pipe dreams after all.

Alas, dear reader, despite the relatively all-pervasive corruption of the media forms, perhaps it would do us well to take heart in the fact that, for the time being at least, alternatives to the mainstream are still available. Provided you look hard enough. Support your local independent newsstand that brings you zines published in basements across the land, support independent film and television, and keep watch for the bias in all its forms. For in the end we return to the old adage of "Never trust what you read (see, hear, etc.)." Amen.

Politics is getting GREEN-er

Green Party now has official presence on campus

By TAL HENDERSON

THE GREENS ARE GROWING. The political party that evolved from the "Green movement" is starting to be recognized for the value of its unique policy and vision.

If your society and economy are unsustainable, your society and economy will crash.

The Green Party is recognized internationally for its commitment to sustainability, social justice, equality, non-violence and consensus-based democracy, although the press often represents it as a single-issue "environmental group." The Green conception of the environment is more straightforward than other parties: if your society and economy are unsustainable, your society and economy will crash. The Green Party suggests sustainable solutions to the many crises facing us today, including solar power, proportional representation, welfare reform and steady-state economics.

Why is the Green Party finding voter support on the rise? There are a few possibilities. The first is that the Greens have matured into a cohesive political party with an active membership and consistent, responsible leadership. The factions that, in the past, have torn the party between dogmatic ideology and transitional pragmatism are now accepting the common ground between the two.

However, a political party does not gain voter support just because it is well organized. For years now, voters have been saying to Green candidates "I agree with your policies, I just don't think that you'll win, and I don't want to waste my vote." But with every passing year, the rationale for Green policy becomes increasingly clear. The actions of federal and provincial governments that have demonstrated clear contempt for their constituencies and a daily lengthening list of social and environmental travesties have driven Canadians to look for answers in places they have not looked before.

There are Green Parties in European-western democratic nations around the world, but they have had greatest success in Europe where there are now over 200 elected Green Party members. The October election in Germany just saw die Grünen (the German Green Party) take 6.7 per cent of the vote and help to form the new coalition government.

Canada, like the USA and the UK, still finds the Greens receiving less support in elections compared with the other nations in which they run. This is due in large part to these three nation's reluctance to exchange the antiquated "first-past-the-post" electoral system for more representational and democratic forms like the proportional representation system used in many European countries.

Southeastern Ontario is the Canadian "hotbed" of Green support. Candidate Chris Walker of Kingston and the Islands riding had the second highest number of Green votes in the last Canadian federal election, beaten only by Peter Bevan-Baker of neighbouring Brockville.

For the first time this year, the Greens have an official presence on campus. Chris Walker hosted the Greens Association inaugural meeting this past Sunday evening. The campus group will be helping to research and craft Green Party policy, assist with the platform and process for the coming provincial election, and working to raise awareness of alternatives for voters in the Queen's community. Meetings are held fortnightly on Sunday evenings.

For more information on the Greens, please contact Cait O'Novan at 4co@qlink.queensu.ca.

Queen's outlasts RMC

WELCOME BACK COLLINS

After a tumultuous three and a half seasons with the Carolina Panthers which included racial slurs, inconsistent play and a lack of desire, New Orleans Saints quarterback Kerry Collins returned to play against his old mates. Collins was received with raucous disapproval on the part of the Panther fans, even though he did not have a chance to play a down. After a busy day of holding a clipboard and sniffling to the adoring fans, Collins was granted permission to stay at his old home for the night. He used his time effectively by getting drunk and was subsequently pulled over for drunk driving. Good job, Kerry.

BLUE JAY STEWART

Amidst all of the inner turmoil involving the Toronto Blue Jays, a productive announcement was made. Former all-star pitcher Dave Stewart was granted the management staff as assistant General Manager after spending a season as pitching coach for the National League Champion San Diego Padres. Stewart, who was a member of three World Series teams, including the 1993 Blue Jays, won 20 games on four separate occasions. As a pitcher, Stewart was known for the most intimidating glare in all of baseball. Hopefully for the Jays, Stewart will be able to use his menacing eyes to gain the upper hand in contract negotiations.

COLLEGE MATH

Confusion has already begun with the two-week old Bowl Championship Series rating system in NCAA football. As a response to complaints about having two national champions, a new complex mathematical scheme of ranking teams has been developed. With four teams currently undefeated (Kansas St., UCLA, Ohio St. and Tennessee) the computer rankings are forced to do what voters used to have to do — choose who the top teams in the country are based on guesswork. Hopefully only two teams will finish the regular season undefeated or the national title picture could be as out of focus as ever.

On Wednesday evening, Jock Harty Arena was the setting for the most recent chapter in the century-old ice war between Queen's and RMC. Despite a somewhat ragged effort, the favoured Gaels were able to put down the Palladins' challenge, scoring twice in the third period to triumph 5-3.

With the victory, Queen's improved to 2-1-2 on the young season and moved into first place in the OUA Midwest division.

RMC	3

Queen's Head Coach Chris MacDonald felt his team was somewhat fortunate to emerge from the contest with two points in the standings. "We were outworked tonight... we were frequently being beaten to the puck," he remarked. "RMC played very well tonight and they deserve a lot of credit. We have to take into account that they get up more for us than any other team."

After the opening 20 minutes ended in a 1-1 tie, the Gaels came out flying for the middle frame, with goals just over a minute apart by Jason Flynn and Jeff Scobie. Scobie had three points on the evening and his goal staked the Gaels to a 3-1 lead.

"The first five to ten minutes of the second period, we were the team we should have been all night," MacDonald commented.

Following the brief outburst, RMC drew even at three, with defenceman Dave Lachapelle's second power-play goal of the evening and a tally late in the period by forward Jeff Kiekham. The Palladins continued the assault on Queen's netminder Jason Sklunick, who had been shaky on the previous goals.

However, at 7:40 of the final period, RMC's Kiekham took a foolish unsportsmanlike conduct penalty, giving the Gaels a golden opportunity to right themselves. Off the ensuing draw, Flynn took a pass in the left wing corner and centred to Rob Mailloux, salivating in the slot. Palladins' goaltender Thomas Connery, who had been heroic in keeping his club in contention, was helpless as the Gaels' sniper wired home the winning goal. "You give [Mailloux] time down low, he'll find a hole," said MacDonald. Shortly thereafter, blueliner Wes Booker's sixty-foot shot eluded a screened Connery for a shorthanded goal, effectively salting away the win. The Gaels resume action with two home games this weekend, as they host Ryerson in a 1 p.m. tilt on Saturday, followed by a match with Brock on Sunday afternoon.

WORD ON THE STREET

By NICK SINCLAIR

On October 25, Jeff Kugel of the Windsor Spitfires was involved in an incident of heretofore unparalleled violence. In the course of a home game against the Owen Sound Platers, the 6' 7", 265 pound goon stormed off the bench and attacked an already-engaged member of the opposing team from behind. He then delivered a most inspiring performance which conjured up images of Mike Tyson gone berserk on ice. The only difference between the aforementioned boxer and Kugel is that Tyson can probably skate better.

His actions, though senseless, were merely an extension of the duties he is regularly expected to perform.

Personally, while I agree with the lifetime ban that he received from the OHL, I feel a sense of sympathy towards the Windsor forward. Yes, it's true that he committed the cardinal sin of leaving the bench and jumping into a fight as the third man. However, as a 17th round draft pick with one career goal, Kugel's job description with the Spitfires was abundantly clear. His was the role of the proverbial enforcer; the player whose presence on the team is justified not by his talent or potential, but rather by his sheer ability to pummel overzealous opponents into submission. Thus, while he clearly lost all measure of control on October 25, his actions, though senseless, were merely an extension of the duties he is regularly expected to perform for the Spitfires. Kugel is paid to fight, plain and simple.

After a few moments of reflection I considered what this meant. Since fighting constitutes a breach of hockey's rules, hence the five minute penalty, enforcers are employed for the sole purpose of breaking rules. Yet, somehow, North American hockey, unlike any other sport in the world, condones the presence

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

With a spectacular three gold medal performance at the Queen's tri-meet on Saturday, swimming superstar Anne Rowan-Legg left little doubt who would be this week's Queen's Journal athlete of the week.

With wins in the 50m butterfly, 100m freestyle and the 100m backstroke, Rowan-Legg helped pace the team to victory over RMC, Ryerson and Trent. The third-year life science student was especially happy with the fact that her success came at her home pool.

"It was nice to have a meet here and see some people come out for it," said Rowan-Legg. The victory this weekend continued the squad's winning ways — they are undefeated on the season. Despite having four months in the season, Rowan-Legg is excited about this year's prospects.

"I think it is going to be a good year," she said. "We have a lot of strong rookies this year who will add a lot to the team."

The 6' 2" Ottawa native has been swimming competitively in Ontario for 12 years, and specializes in the 200m backstroke and 200m individual medley. It is in those two events that she qualified last season for the CIAU Championships and expects to be there again this year.

With the squad on a roll, Head Coach Brett Helmstead is very excited about where the team is headed and about it's leader, Rowan-Legg. "Anne is the mainstay of a good group of swimmers that are in their second year of growing together," he said. "There is really nothing bad I can say about [Anne], she is a fantastic kid, has amazing work attitude and an excellent team attitude and pushes all the other swimmers."

Helmstead hopes to double the number of this year's CIAU qualifiers from four to eight, and Rowan-Legg expects improvement as well.

The team has a long season before the national finals in Guelph at the end of February, but they will be fighting the winter blues with a Christmas training camp in Florida.

The team is hoping that 'fun in the sun' will help them in their bid for improved CIAU results. If Rowan-Legg continues her current pace, the improved results are on their way.

of such players. In fact it is the only sport that legislates acceptable and unacceptable ways to break rules. For instance, the rule that Kugel broke, the one that tells players not to leave the bench to become the third man in an altercation, essentially lays down guidelines for appropriate brawling. Perhaps boxing should consider adopting proper ear-biting etiquette (Take one clean bite, not too hard, and then gracefully present the opponent with the severed portion of his anatomy).

To those who feel that having a goon is a perfectly acceptable way of keeping hockey clean, consider the following scenario. What if the Kingston Frontenacs decided to buck 'conventional' (some might say neanderthal), hockey wisdom and sign an enforcer whose job it is to cross-check opposing players that got a little too physical? I can hear the Don Cherry's of the world screaming till they're blue in the face that fighting is a far lesser evil than cross-checking. Naturally, I'm sure they've all done extensive research on the effects that fist fighting has on human behaviour and have come to the sage conclusion that such conduct is an excellent way to relieve tension. To all the self-proclaimed shrinks out there who feel equipped to write a thesis on why fighting should remain part of hockey, I have concocted an analogy that is commensurate to your level of intelligence. Instructing hockey players that a fight is a much more palpable expression of frustration than illegal stick work is tantamount to telling one's children that beating up other kids is a perfectly acceptable way of blowing off some steam, so long as no weapons used to expedite the process.

Laughing it off

By JULIETA LOEFFLER

They say that you need three hugs a day to survive, but I say you need three laughs. I am not talking about a little giggle here and there throughout your day. No, I am talking about a full-fledged bout of laughter. But when is a laugh more than just a silly sound coming out of your mouth? Always. A laugh is a very good tool for stress reduction, abdominal workouts, calorie burning plus it tricks your brain into thinking it is actually happy.

The first step in optimizing the value of laughter is to do it properly and frequently. Proper laughter is as simple as One-Two-Three. Step One: Find something amusing. If that proves too difficult, just start laughing for no reason. Step Two: Ensure that funny sounding things are coming of your mouth. Step Three:

Reap the benefits that stem from a good laugh.

When you join the laughing world, you will become a whole new person. By giggling frequently, you will relieve a lot of stress from your body. In this case, adults should take a good look at children and try to imitate them. Children laugh freely and seem to have no worries. Kids walk lighter and smile wider — you can too.

For all those who are doing Abs of Steel like it is going out of style, I would like to recommend a 10-minute laugh session a day. Laughing is a great abdominal workout. When you are in stitches, you are working all your intercostal muscles (in and around your ribs), your oblique muscles (side abdominal muscles) as well as your upper and lower abs.

Cracking up for an extended period of time not only works your middle section; it also works your heart. The health benefits of a few short bouts of physical activity a day are high. It will burn a lot of calories, leave you feeling energized and ready to tackle any task. While you are "rolling in the aisles" you are breathing harder and pumping blood faster, both benefits of an aerobic workout.

People tend to think that the world is a very serious place with lots of problems. While being doubled up with laughter, the stresses of daily life are no longer an area of focus. Decrease your stress levels, increase your caloric output, give your muscles a workout and feel lighter: all this can be accomplished by one good laugh. I challenge everyone to do whatever it takes to smile freer, laugh harder and live lighter.

Queen's athletic results and awards

Women's tennis

The beat goes on for women's tennis standout Paula Myslivecek who repeated her OUA individual singles championship from last season by crushing Toronto's Alice Rideout 7-5, 6-0 in Waterloo. Myslivecek followed that victory up by joining her doubles partner Melanee Short in repeating their OUA doubles championship from last season by defeating Susan Huang and Heather MacIlravy of McMaster. The team dominated their opponents 6-2, 6-1, with a stellar serve and volley game. Myslivecek finished up the season undefeated and has not lost in her two year Queen's career.

Rowing

The rowing squad travelled to the OUA Finals in St. Catharines and both teams finished well. The women's team finished in fourth place, and the men were able to squeak into the medals, with a bronze performance.

Individual silver medals went to lightweight men's single sculler Corey Armitage and the lightweight women's eight. The team also earned five bronze medals over the weekend. The team competes in the Canadian Championships in Victoria this weekend.

Soccer

On the heels of earning an invitation to the CIAU finals, members of the Queen's women's soccer team received numerous individual honours. Former all-Canadians Judith Trepanier and Raeleen Dunne headed the list of OUA East all-stars and they were joined by first time all-stars, midfielder Audrey McKay and fleet footed forward Angie Crockford. The selected players were joined by

Head Coach Dave McDowell who was named OUA East coach of the year. The four Gael representatives were the most of any team.

On the men's side, leading scorer and striker Mike Cowan was the only all-star amongst the group.

Football

The O-QIFC all-conference honours were handed down this week and despite missing the playoffs Queen's was well represented with four players selected. Running back Paul Correale and inside receiver James MacLean represented the Gaels on the offence. Defensively, end Jim 'the sack guru' Aru was a unanimous selection and was joined on defence by teammate, defensive tackle James Osborne. Osborne, Aru and Correale were all selected to their third team, while MacLean was named to his first.

The Battle is over DJ contest ends with a "mix" of talents, but Alfie's "scratches"

Alfie tore it up for the crowd at Alfie's on Wednesday

BATTLE OF THE DJS BY LUCAS COSTELLO AND CHAD DAVIS

Once again, Queen's has taken the underground essence of Hip Hop and attempted to present it to the ignorant masses. Though twice as many people attended the second round of Alfie's DJ competition on Wednesday night, this was probably due to the closing of the Queen's Pub.

True practitioners of the art of turntablism were few and far between, but unappreciative "heads" were blessed by the performance of four would-be turntablists. DJ Mythic was the first to perform with a nice intro and ambient sounds. Unfortunately, with the lack of cutting or scratching and the dragging tone of the set, his performance was disappointing compared to last week.

Shinobi was the second up on the stage, and after a nice beat juggling intro using Natural Resource's Bum Deal Remix he faltered with poor beatmixing and lack of stage presence. His vinyl changing was too slow and did not keep up with the quick cutting. He recovered halfway through his set with brilliant elbow scratching and the fastest cutting all evening while playing BEP's "Fallin' Up" at 45 rpm. He ended his set mixing House and Hip Hop and calling out to fake DJ's who can't scratch.

Neil Brown returned with his record serving lackey who's presence was unnecessary. The only other time a record server was used in a DJ competition was when a five year old boy competed in the 1996 DMC Eastern Semi-Finals and his father handed him the vinyl. For a review of Brown's performance check last week's Journal. He used the same set and made the same mistakes, something that he would be disqualified for in any other DJ contest.

Ali then took control and after technical difficulties with the speakers, mixed in Martin Luther King Jr.'s "I Have a Dream" speech with House. While some beatmixing was off, he recovered halfway through his set with scratching that was precise and on point. He cleverly used a Peter Pan record by backcuing the record without cutting out the distorted noise over Xzibit's "What U See is What U Get" instrumental. The creative mixing of Lauryn Hill's "Lost Ones" over a breakbeat was another highlight during his performance.

Ali received first place and $500 prize for his set. Neil

Brown received second place for his reshaped performance. The results of the competition brought to light one of the many flaws that this contest suffered from. The judges should have all been turntablists and should not have been associated in any way with Alfie's or the DJs competing. As well, the 30 minute DJ sets were far too long for any

Laughing at death Funerals n' Things intrigues audiences

Death Defying. The cast of Funerals n' Things will not be far from mourning this weekend.

PLAY REVIEW BY LINDSAY ROBERTSON

Funerals n' Things is a light-hearted look at love, death and the funeral business. From the Funeral Director's Notes, Peter Fulton, writer, director and recent Queen's grad states, "grief is extremely personal — me, I like to laugh. A lot. Funerals n' Things is all about having a good laugh. Let's laugh at death."

Curious to find out what the "things" would turn out to be, I was pleasantly surprised to meet Griefy The Clown in the lobby, who satisfied our pre-show needs with balloon animals and humour. Griefy's existence is to, "make the trip to the Funeral home a little less miserable." From the start, the audience is made aware that we do not know what to expect.

Beginning with Griefy The Clown, the participatory role of the audience continues as they become guests at the funeral. Asked whether we knew the deceased well, the audience then moved into the crazy world of the funeral director, a ring master of death so to speak, played by Dave Ritchie. He was a friendly sequined Beatlequeuse who lead the audience through a story of revenge and love; ironically however, he makes a living out of death.

The play starts in the present and runs the audience through different flashbacks, so the audience sees the extremes people are prepared to go through, in order to retrieve their rightful love.

The actors' convincing characterization creates a powerful dynamic within the trio, allowing the relationships to work well. Ritchie's lines are both well written and delivered — which produce laughter from the audience throughout the production. The acting, which is slick on all accounts, is another strong point of the production.

Fulton incorporates slide projection to accompany the actors' thoughts, which produces a lot of the humour. He also utilizes other imaginative staging techniques, which I will leave for you to discover for yourselves. The staging will hold your attention when, on the rare occasion, the script drags and digresses from the main storyline.

Funerals n' Things provides a welcome break from the hell students' call study. Stay alert however, to appreciate the intrigue, random humour and fine acting. Funerals n' Things is definitely, "more than just funerals."

The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion Acme Capitol Records BY ANDY POOLE

I don't know if it's just me, but the word Acme automatically conjures up an image of the Looney Tunes cartoon Coyote sending away for some gadgetry to help him catch the Roadrunner.

Jon Spencer Blues Explosion does little to knock this image out of my head. Flashy artwork, slick packaging and a sexy name certainly make one think that this band has something interesting to say. Too bad the music falls flat on its ass.

The first track "Calvin" announces "this is blues power... Let's have a party" and proceeds into a slick studio effect of overdubbed funk riffs that never gets off the ground.

"Magical Colours" the next track, cries out "come on baby, I got to get into your bizness" and keeps crying out to be rescued from the mediocre musicianship and inane lyrics. The rest of the CD is no better.

This CD can best be summed up by a selection of its song titles. "I wanna make it alright" (apparently, so does their record company judging by the amount of money spent so far pushing this recording), "Torture" (to Listen to) and "Attack" (on the senses and your intelligence).

This recording is the "Flavour of the month" from the corporate music world and just leaves a bad taste in my mouth.

I recommend that you buy Miles Davis's Kind of Blue if you want a real blues explosion because The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion fizzles.

A&E in brief

Keeping their spirit Up: R.E.M. has released, Up, their first album since drummer Bill Berry tumbled last fall after a near fatal brain aneurism. The band will not publicize their new album, except for benefit performances and TV appearances. Guitarist Peter Buck says the album is strong, but whether it will get much publicity is questionable.

No longer a building mystery: A judge on Tuesday ruled in favour of Sarah McLachlan in an early round of a lawsuit filed by former band mate Darryl Neudorf. He claims he co-wrote four songs on the 1988 Touch album. Members of Sarah's former band October Game were not allowed to testify against her.

Chillin' in a new neighbourhood: Bob Trow, a regular performer for 30 years on Mister Roger's Neighbourhood died Monday at age 72 of a heart attack. Trow portrayed Robert Troll, Boh Dog and himself. He taped his final appearances last week, which will air in February.

Proud to be the original shirtless pooper? A man claiming to be the model for Seinfeld's George Costanza has filed a $100 million lawsuit claiming Jerry Seinfeld stole his identity. Michael Costanza went to college with Seinfeld and is accusing him and the production of slander and libel. Both Costanzas are short, fat and have adventures in bathrooms and parking spots.

Technicolour Dream or Nightmare?: Donny and Marie Osmond are the hosts of a new syndicated talk show. The show aims to appeal to the whole family. Jerry Springer was at recent guest who accompanied the siblings in a little sing along. (How cute.)

AsianDubFoundation
Rafi's Revenge
London Records

By ALEX KRONBY

What do you get when you mix Beasties with Marley, add some new soft beats and then stir in some Asian/East Indian background accompaniment? AsianDubFoundation. Once you are actually able to pronounce the band's name you are introduced to the music — and how funky it is.

Eventually I gave up. I later surrendered myself to the "rhythm and rhyme," foregoing the importance of audible lyrics for the mix of instrumental funk.

The mix of reggae and soft rap with mystic and hypnotizing Asian and East Indian back beats is constant throughout Rafi's Revenge. The speed and style of the album is characterized by the first track "Naxalite." It begins, as many of the tracks do, with a catchy interlude which is repeated throughout the song.

The next track "Buzzin" lacks some of the 'catchiness' of the first track, yet it too, possesses some of the hypnotic and funky beats of its predecessor.

The album's lyrics leave something to the imagination though. At times I had no idea what the hell the band was saying. They articulate (and I use this word loosely) in "Buzzin" that they "can't live [their] life with no rhythm or rhyme." Thank god the album includes handy written lyrics, or else we would have no idea how the band felt.

It has sometimes been stated that it is cool not to understand lyrics that artists so cleverly and painstakingly construct and rather just 'groove' with the "rhythm and rhyme" of the tunes. It would be nice however, to understand sometimes what the hell they are singing about — if anything relevant or thought provoking at all.

In the case of Rafi's Revenge it is only a small shame that the words are lost in the dominant music bears and sounds of incoherency.

Eventually I gave up. I later surrendered myself to the "rhythm and rhyme," foregoing the importance of audible lyrics for the mix of instrumental funk, wherein I became a "Hypocrite," (track five) of my own argument.

Like most CDs, this one cannot be played from start to finish without skipping or at least fast-forwarding some of the songs.

Regardless, Rafi's Revenge encompasses a variety of original tracks, all of which devote something to the ever-loved style of reggae/rap — with an unusual twist of culturally different music.

Despite its incoherent lyrics, perhaps Rafi's Revenge is suggestive of the ability of mixed cultures to harmonize in the universal sound of music.

John Lee Hooker
The Best of Friends
Virgin Records

By JIM WHITTINGTON

John Lee Hooker just keeps on pumping out these damn guest-heavy compilations. The Best of Friends marks the Hook's fifth such album of his modern career and proves once again that there aren't many musicians that will turn down the chance to play with the king of the boogie.

As for the legendary Clapton, his input on "Boogie Chill'in" is far less than what is expected from "slowhand."

The CD is loaded with some big names — Bonnie Raitt, Van Morrison, Ben Harper and Eric Clapton. Surprisingly, there is actually a lot of musical chemistry here, something that can't be said for some of Hooker's previous collaborative efforts.

Most of the tracks are taken from compilation albums released during the past 11 years, and individually these songs stand out as some of Hooker's best work.

Best of the best honours go to "I Cover the Waterfront" with Van Morrison, who, believe it or not, complements Hooker's voice perfectly, and shows he's a pretty good blues-man himself. Other highlights include "The Healer" with Santana, which is great for Santana fans, but isn't recorded with the diehard Hooker fan in mind. As well, "Boom Boom" with Jimmie Vaughn has a lot more jump than the original.

Among the best collaboration on the disc are two brand new tracks featuring Harper and Ry Cooder. Harper's signature Weissenborn slide playing is perfect for Hooker's boogie classic "Burning Hell," and Cooder helps put together one of the best songs on the album in "Big Legs Tight Skirt." As for the legendary Clapton, his input on "Boogie Chill'in" is far less than what is expected from "slowhand." Either he is uncomfortable with Hooker's sound and style or he's still hung over from his Pilgrim album.

Overall, this is a really good album. Hooker picks out some real gems from his last few albums and gives some new life to some old classics.

If you're still into the old guy then you'll really enjoy this album, but don't shy away from it if you're not. It's worth owning just to hear some of his guests put a new twist on his old work.

Various Artists
Slam, the soundtrack
Immortal/Epic Records

By ELI SCHUSTER

I wasn't entirely sure what to expect at first, but after listening to the soundtrack to the movie Slam a few times, I have to admit that it is one of the better rap collections to come down the pike in quite awhile.

The rest of the songs on the CD aren't bad (they ain't great, either), and the occasional music-less, spoken-word poetry moments seem more like filler material than anything else.

Yes, as a nerdy white guy from the suburbs who couldn't rhyme his way out of a paper bag, I may not appear to be much of a rap expert, but hey... I know my way around the streets, and I think this CD is awesome.

Okay, that was extremely cheesy. The truth is I don't know that much about rap music, and the only "street" I'm familiar with is "Sesame Street." Still, I stand by my earlier statement: the Slam soundtrack is a great collection of new rap tunes.

The truth is I don't know that much about rap music, and the only "street" I'm familiar with is "Sesame Street."

Big Pun's "Sex, Money and Drugs" (ah yes, the three things you need in graduate school to stay sane) is pure mellow gold, yet my all-time favourite on the album would have to be "The Park," by Coolio and Ol' Dirty Bastard (who's also known as ODB, Ason, Dirt McGirt, Osirus, and Big Baby Jesus), which is a re-working of the Blackbyrd's old school classic "Rock Creek Park." It is, as the press release says, a true "party-starter."

The rest of the songs on the CD aren't bad (they ain't great, either), and the occasional music-less, spoken-word poetry moments seem more like filler material than anything else, but that's the way most CDs are: you're laughing if you can find one or two songs you enjoy, and I think I lucked out with this puppy.

I hadn't heard of the movie Slam before I brought this CD home, but I am a little intrigued; it won both the 1998 Grand Jury Prize at the Sundance Film Festival, and the Audience Award at Cannes. If it's as good as the soundtrack, I'm there.

Breslow directs Imaginary Invalid

By SARAH CROSBIE

Everyone remembers their first love. For Maury Breslow, drama professor and the director of this fall's drama major, one of his first was Molière.

Nearing the end of his professional teaching career, Breslow has chosen Molière's Imaginary Invalid as his last directing project at Queen's. The significance of this fact does not go unnoticed, while he talks about what he considers, "the best comedic play, by the best comic writer who ever lived."

Breslow first saw Imaginary Invalid at Cornell when he was graduating with his Bachelors degree. The play was the school's spring drama major and was revived for convocation. He said, "I thought it was hysterically funny. I've never seen my parents in such a good mood. It is really a wonderful happy memory."

After his Bachelors degree, Breslow wrote his Masters Degree on Molière and read all the work in its original French text.

The Imaginary Invalid is a comedic play described by Breslow as, "a light-hearted look at the 'too serious' field of medical science through the eyes of its early practitioners and patients."

The play explores the relationship between a hypochondriac Argan, his daughter Angélique and a young doctor, Thomas Diafoirus, to whom Argan has promised his daughter's hand in marriage. Argan believes having a doctor in the family will be beneficial to his severe medical condition. Angélique has other plans however, in that she hopes to marry a man named Cleante. The plot is further enriched by Béline, Angélique's scheming step-mother who wants her step-daughter to be sent to a convent in order to cut her out of Argan's estate, and Joinette, the servant who does not let Béline's manipulations go unnoticed.

Breslow translated Imaginary Invalid this past summer, as he found existing versions, "old and convoluted." He believes his translation, "sounds and flows better, yet it is completely accurate."

"I didn't update it. I made it timeless. The characters are eternal," he stated.

The production of Molière's last comedy will be performed at Theological Hall in the Rotunda theatre and features Perry Mucci, Paula Schultz, Erica Garington, Karina Mackenzie, David Nugent, Dorian Foley, Gregg Wade, Lenny Epstein, Jen Lahey and Liam Karry, who Breslow said, "are a good bunch of people with lots of energy, [who have] caught the spirit of the show."

Although Breslow realizes, "[he's] doing the last part of [his] career," he said with gleaming eyes, "I can't be thankful when doing this play."

The Imaginary Invalid's insight into the life of, "a deluded guy," runs on November 12-15 and 18-21. Tickets are $10 for non-students and $8 for students and seniors.

MED TV promises a cure

VARIETY SHOW PREVIEW

By TANIA HAAS

Wouldn't you like to see a future gynecologist getting jiggy with it? Or a musical number written, produced and directed by the same people who would normally be checking you for infectious diseases? Well, wait no longer, the time has come for Meds Variety Night 1998 — MED TV.

Co-directors Rob Tanzola and Jeannie Choi have been working on the MED TV project for months, and the cast has been rehearsing since September. Almost 100 per cent of the first and second-year medical classes are involved, along with contributions from life science, the Faculty of Nursing and the School of Rehabilitation Therapy. Tanzola said, "The nursing skit is not to be missed" and believes the entire show will be an "extravaganza."

"The nursing skit is not to be missed."

— Rob Tanzola, Co-director of MED TV

Past themes have included Meds in Space and Academy Award-like spoofs, but this year's theme is sure to hit your funny bone (if you get my drift).

MED TV will be a kaleidoscope of familiar shows, stories and characters and the costumes are promised to be more lavish than bland hospital pants.

Variety night, an annual event in its 28th year, will attempt to raise thousands of dollars for local charities by making you laugh and cry. All proceeds come from ticket sales and local advertising. This year, the funds raised will be divided between 12 different charities, including Better Beginnings, Kingston AIDS Project and the Sexual Assault Crisis Centre. The variety show has become somewhat of an umbrella organization under the Health Sciences department.

Past themes have included Meds in Space and Academy Award-like spoofs, but this year's theme is sure to hit your funny bone.

Two years ago, $17,000 was raised and MED TV is determined to reach this total again. Tanzola couldn't control his excitement over the show, "seeing my entire class and faculty work together on a common goal has been the best outcome out of my directing experience. Not to mention the great excuse it was to avoid my work."

Now the surgeon's tools are in our hands. Purchase your tickets, for the November 12, 13 and 14 performances at Botterell Hall, MacCorry and the John Deutsch University Centre from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Ticket prices are $8 on Thursday, $9 on Friday and $10 on Saturday.

It's Franklin's Fault

Ska-jazz septet leaves Clark's faithful satisfied

Faultless Act. The members of Franklin's Fault relax after their Wednesday Night show at Clark.

CONCERT REVIEW

By KATE HUNTER

It would take more than a few broken bones to keep Franklin's Fault from being in top form.

The local band rocked a packed house at Clark Hall Pub Wednesday night, despite the fact that lead vocalist Chris Brunn is suffering from a broken foot from a dancing accident. This did not keep him from attacking every song with full enthusiasm.

Franklin's Fault was surrounded by an "I could not be having any more fun if I tried" attitude. Playing their funky originals and covering unconventional, albeit catchy tunes, the band's music had the majority of the audience on their feet.

The seven-piece band, which includes vocals, bass, guitar, keyboard, trumpet and trombone produced an incredible sound without much effort. Every song was a rampage of fanaticism. The band seemed as if they were absolutely thrilled to be playing for you and they made sure they shared this feeling.

Their mix of ska and jazz is so spastic and fun that just listening to them is impossible — you just gotta dance.

Whether the band played an original such as "Big man on campus" or covered Milli Vanilli's "Girl you know it's true," they sparkled with high performance. Their mix of ska and jazz was so spastic and fun that just listening to them was impossible — you just gotta dance.

So if you were not part of the maximum capacity crowd at Clark Hall Pub, you have yet to be sucked into the musical world of Franklin's Fault. Wednesday night's performance was an indication that Franklin's Fault should not be missed because their enthusiasm can't be contained much longer.

During the second song, the

PRESENTS A SEASONAL COLOURING CONTEST

A CHRISTMAS STORY

THE FIGURE RIDES INTO TOWN like a fiery tumbleweed, his belly shaking like a nervous gunslinger's apprentice. On this dark, cold Texan night, beasts huddle together for warmth, lovers hold each other tight underneath their blankets. The only thing awake is the town drunk, singing "Oh, Susannah" in a gruff, slurred tone as he stumbles along main street.

The next day in the saloon he would tell anyone who'd listen of the night-riding cowboy who slung an enormous pack over his shoulder; who dressed in red and white wool; who wore black boots without spurs; whose steed had a nose that glowed like burning coal. And not a soul would believe him. Yet Billy couldn't explain the brightly coloured box he found by his woodstove that morning - a box which held the brand-new cattleprod he'd been wishing for all year. Nor could Madame Delaney, owner of the town brothel, finger the identity of the person who gave her the gorgeous crimson silk scarf she was now showing off. She vaguely remembers the night before, a voice calling out in the darkness:

"Merry Christmas y'all, and y'all have a good night. Kneeeeeeeeeee-hawh!!"

Ken Butland is very sick, and went home to bed, like we told him.

Paul Martin speaks

By SHAWN BRIMLEY

Last Friday, Minister of Finance Paul Martin spoke to a crowd of approximately 500 people in the John Deutsch University Centre on his experiences in government, and the problems Canadians will face in the next century.

Martin's speech focused on the role of the state, problems of government and the pressure to spend now that the budget is balanced and the deficit is declining.

"The government is making the decisions it must, for the betterment of our country," Martin said. "Its goal is to be dictated to by Main Street, not by Wall Street."

"What we have done as a country over the past four years is virtually unparalleled," Martin said. "We should stop congratulating ourselves for a victory won, and we must begin to ask ourselves, 'Where do we go from here?'"

The globalization of economies and the increasing competition between states are the primary reasons why the deficit has to be eliminated, Martin asserted.

"There is no change as fundamental as the marriage of globalization with instant communication," Martin said. "The effect of that on the state is the deepest issue which affects our government and our country."

"Globalization effectively means increasing inequalities in our society," Martin said. "The increasing disparity between the rich and the poor is essentially due to a global society in which the winners take all."

"When I first became Finance Minister, I spent five per cent of my time on foreign affairs," Martin said. "Now I spend 30 to 40 per cent of my time on

IBM gives Queen's $1 million grant

By FIONA STEVENSON

A high performance computing facility will soon be established at Queen's University, courtesy of a $1 million grant from IBM.

The announcement was made by Paul Horn, senior vice-president and director at IBM Research at Queen's on Monday. The proposed facility is a joint venture of the High Performance Computing Virtual Laboratory consortium which includes Queen's, the University of Ottawa, Carleton University and Royal Military College.

"The hardware for the computers will be made available to all four universities," explained Andrew Pollard, Queen's professor of Mechanical Engineering and co-ordinator of the HPCVL consortium. The hardware is expected to arrive at Queen's by December, he added.

HPCVL is a regional member of C3.ca, a national association dedicated to improving Canada's high performance computing network. "C3 is an association that will enable the sharing of high-performance computing resources across Canada," explained Pollard.

"Canada has precious few research high-performance computers for research in universities," he added.

"Programs like the HPCVL will help unlock the full potential of high-performance computing," Horn said in a press release. "This new era of deep computing will help extract valuable information and relationships from unprecedented volumes of data, affecting everything from the design of life-saving drugs to optimizing complex business operations."

The computing facility "will be used to study grand challenge problems," said Pollard. High-performance computing is critical to more than 100 projects at the four universities in areas including drug design, radiology, astrophysics, information technology and policy studies.

"Clearly, the hope is that the research that will [occur at the facility] will actively engage students at the graduate level and eventually at the undergraduate level," Pollard said.

"We are extremely pleased," said Principal Bill Leggett in a press release. "Clearly Queen's and our university partners are conducting research of the highest calibre, and this award further validates the HPCVL consortium's proposal to build a high-performance computing facility."

Students reject OUSA

REFERRENDUM RESULTS

By STEPHANIE CARVIN

The results of the Alma Mater Society referendum were tallied on Wednesday with the majority of questions passing the vote.

Out of 11,613 eligible voters, 1,835 ballots (15.8 per cent) were cast. The referendum results are binding upon the AMS.

A controversial issue of the referendum, the establishment of a mandatory fee for the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance of $1.95, did not pass the referendum. The fee, which would have re-aligned Queen's as a member of OUSA, was supported by 45.5 per cent of students, with 50.5 per cent against and four per cent spoiled ballots.

"This is the end of that, as they say," said Tom Stanley, president of the AMS, who campaigned extensively for the alliance. "I guess I'm disappointed. I feel that OUSA would have made Queen's student's voice more effective. Some broad goals we will never be able to achieve in splintered groups," he added.

Stanley said the issue for this executive is over and they will not bring OUSA up again in the spring referendum. "There will be a new executive by then so it will be the call of the new executive," he said.

The ENGERAMA club also lost its bid for the establishment of a $2.12 optional fee, with 49.2 per cent in favour, 47.6 per cent against and 3.3

Victory for Kealy

By RENEE HUANG

Mike Kealy was buzzing with energy when The Journal caught up with him Thursday, a day after being elected Queen's University Rector. Of the 11 per cent of students who voted, Kealy won approximately 69 per cent of the vote.

"I was waiting here [at home] and watching 'Party of Five'," said Kealy, of his activities on referendum night. "I was getting pretty anxious."

As soon as he received the news of his victory, Kealy said, "I immediately called my parents and a few friends long distance."

Dawn House brings community hope

By JOCELYN LAPORTE

Dawn House women's shelter, one of the services added to the AMS opt-out fee list this year, offers temporary shelter for homeless women and children seeking permanent residence in Kingston. The 10-bed shelter is located close to Queen's campus and has housed students in its beds before.

"The face of homelessness cuts across the years," said acting administrator Laurel Claus-Johnson. She describes the shelter as a "task force against homelessness and mental illness."

Claus-Johnson said she believes homelessness is a monumental problem in Canada. "It is a national shame," she said.

All the shelters in Toronto cannot accommodate the state of homeless in that city, she explained, adding that the same situation exists in Kingston.

"Dawn House has a vision and a mandate, it has rules it has to follow. If we only have 10 beds it can't take in 11 women," said Claus-Johnson. The shelters and churches in Kingston stay in contact with one another in an attempt to take up the slack, she explained.

"The sad part is the ones who fall through the cracks are the ones who need the most help," said Claus-Johnson, pointing in particular to women with mental illnesses, a group she is seeing with more frequency at the shelter.

While a councillor is available to assist the women and their families at the shelter, Claus-Johnson points out there are some problems they are unable to solve because they are a part of the cycle of homelessness.

This cycle often finds women re-establishing themselves within the community only to end up returning to a shelter situation. "I wouldn't even presume to know the solution, I just recognize the problem," said Claus-Johnson.

Although Dawn House is helping some women, it is not a solution to the problem within our society, Claus-Johnson said.

"[Dawn House] is a band-aid and it's doing what it's supposed to do but the long term problem still exists," she said.

"Dawn House has experienced much of Kingston's generosity... but in the long term there is still a cycle of women in poverty whose needs are not being met."

DIRECTIONS

In a story on Jane Doe and her experiences in the last issue of The Journal, the court Doe addressed should have been identified as the Ontario Court of Justice. The article should have stated that the Toronto police were found "negligent" and identified the relevant part of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as Section 15. The Journal regrets the errors.

A dope new beer hits Ontario

By REBECCA STELTER

For beer connoisseurs at Queen's, a unique new brand has just been welcomed into the Ontario Brewets Retail and may soon appear at campus pubs. It's called Hempen Gold and it has been legal to sell in some provinces since March.

The beer is brewed using an extract from hemp seeds which is added to the hops found in any regular beer, explained David Posner, vice-president of Sales and Marketing, Impotted Brands of Canada.

Until recent regulations concerning the Controlled Abuse Act passed in 1996, Canada outlawed the commercial use of hemp due to its association with marijuana. However, it is now legal to cultivate hemp in Canada and, as such, American importers such as Hempen Gold are selling their products in Canadian markets.

"It would take 100 times more THC to produce the effect of marijuana."

— David Posner, vice-president, Impotted Brands of Canada

The relation of hemp to marijuana poses questions as to the level of THC, the active illegal ingredient in cannabis, in the Hempen Gold beer. "There is the legal minimal amount [of THC] in it, but this is only 0.3 micrograms per litre. It would take 100 times more THC to produce the effect of marijuana," said Posner.

"Many people tested thought they felt something different than what they would feel drinking a regular beer," Posner continued, "but in the realities of the THC count, this is not possible." He admitted that perhaps this phenomenon could be somewhat psychological.

Other than the minute amount of THC present in Hempen Gold, there is also a difference in taste and texture. "It's a cream ale, but it's really light," said Posner. "It's a bit more heady than a regular beer; if you were to pour it into a glass and compare it to another brand of beer, you would notice that it is slightly more foamy."

According to Matt Lang, assistant manager at Alfie's Pub, taste is the major determinant as to whether or not Queen's students will find Hempen Gold at Alfie's. "We would consider selling it depending on how it tastes," said Lang. "We try new beers all the time."

"Usually beer reps bring them in and we would usually taste the beer at some point in time. Then, depending on how well the beer is promoted, we might serve the beer," Lang said. "We don't want to put a beer on that's not going to sell."

"We would consider selling it depending on how it tastes... We try new beers all the time."

— Matt Lang, Alfie's assistant manager

At the Queen's Pub, "provided that the university didn't have any problems with it, the QP prides itself on fresh, new, rare beer tasting and would look into offering something like that," said Mark Picketts, manager of the QP. "We've worked hard all year," he continued, "to allow people to come in and try different beers that they might normally not try otherwise."

"The idea of hemp is that it is being used to flavour the beer," Picketts said. "Although I can see why people object to it, I personally wouldn't have a problem with it... It's just a different taste."

"I would try it because it's beer," said Matt Stronach, PhysEd '02, "and beer is good."

Kathleen Wheelahan, Comm '01 said she would "probably not [try Hempen Gold] due to the negative connotation associated with hemp. It doesn't sound like it would taste very good," she added.

"I think it's the evolution of beer," said Geoff Sura, ArtsSci '02.

Hempen Gold has been accepted in Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland. Imported Brands of Canada, which, according to Posner, "represents a couple of different companies, mostly alternative drinks, from overseas and from the United States," is still waiting for acceptance from the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia.

Let us not forget: Queen's students, staff and faculty remembered the fallen on November 11. Hundreds filled Grant Hall during the Remembrance Day ceremony.

69.4 per cent win for Kealy

Jim Quinn, the other Rector candidate, also called to offer congratulations, and Kealy said he enjoyed getting to know Quinn over the course of the campaign. "He was a great guy to run against," Kealy said.

"[My dad] was pretty proud and reminded me what a serious commitment it was and not to neglect my school work," Kealy said.

Over the next few months, former Rector Ian Michael will work with Kealy and advise him on the intricacies of the job.

"It's an odd position," said

Kealy, reflecting on the role of the Rector. "No one really knows about it. The office is right in the JDUC and I didn't really know about it until this year," he admitted.

As stated in his campaign, Kealy pledged to focus on accessibility of the Rector to students. He also hopes to prepare and maintain a Web site to post public information "so that people can see what's going on at the highest level, and keep students aware." Kealy will "keep in as close contact with the AMS and SGPS as possible... [and] make sure money is being spent responsibly."

Critics voice opinions to Finance Minister

By STEPHANIE CARVIN

Approximately 10 protesters greeted Finance Minister Paul Martin at the John Deutsch University Centre last Friday before he delivered a speech to members of the university and Kingston communities.

Two members of the Raging Grannies, a group of elderly women who protest social inequity by dressing extravagantly and singing satirical songs, were among protesters. As Martin approached them, the protesters sang a song against bank mergers and poverty in Canada. Following the song, Martin took a few moments to speak with the protesters.

The Grannies questioned Martin on Federal-Provincial downloading and cutbacks to social programs. "We insist that money goes into child care," Sister Jean Higgins of the Grannies told Martin. "Change the rules now... It's absurd in terms of inequality."

Martin said he wasn't pleased with everything that the federal government had to do to take care of the deficit, and said the government will try to ensure the provinces allocate funding in the way the federal government wants them to.

Sister Pauline Lally of the Justice and Peace Office of the Sisters of Providence of St. Vincent de Paul denounced cutbacks and child poverty to Martin, while others held up signs to protest cuts to programs.

The Grannies and Lally were pleased that the minister spoke with them. "It's great that he talked to us," said Higgins. "I didn't believe everything he said but it was awfully nice."

"To be quite honest the points that they are making are quite valid, talking about child poverty," Martin said. "Maybe if I wasn't the Minister of Finance I'd be out there with them."

In Wallace Hall, where Martin gave his talk, protesters posted and carried signs condemning poverty and cuts to social programs. One individual shouted as Martin began to speak. "Ask a question at the microphone when I am finished," Martin said.

When the protester resumed his heckling a few minutes later, Martin dismissed him as "someone who doesn't have the guts to ask a question at a microphone," at which point many members of the audience cheered.

"Instead of letting your mouth flap take a look at what happened [in Canadian politics this year]," Martin said, at which point the protesters quieted down significantly for the rest of the talk.

'Not going back into deficit'

international matters."

"No matter what a government does within its borders to get itself into shape, it is impossible to succeed if substantial portions of the rest of the world are in chaos," Martin commented.

"We have got to understand that in the global world in which we live, that the greatest natural resources do not lie buried beneath the ground, but they lie in the skill and talents of those who walk upon it," Martin said.

"The role of the state must be to give people the tools they require to succeed," he said.

According to the Finance Minister, issues of education, poverty and disparity must be the "preoccupation of any government."

Martin appeared frustrated when he spoke of the pressures on him to spend and specifically, to give the Employment Insurance surplus back to workers. "We now live in a world where two thirds of the nations' economies outside North America and Europe are in recession. This is not the time to take chances with the nation's finances," Martin argued. "We are going to reduce EI premiums, we are going to improve benefits as we can, but we are not going back into deficit. It's simply too important to Canadians that we stop adding debt on top of debt."

"If we as Canadians deal with our current problems, let me tell you something, there is nothing that will stop this country," Martin said. "There is nothing that will prevent your generation from doing what in fact, my generation had the opportunity to do, and that is to take control of their own destiny."

Survivor tells story

Herbert Goldstein
By JONATHAN TINNEY

In commemoration of Holocaust Awareness Week, Queen's Hillel Society presented speaker Herbert Goldstein on Monday evening in Stirling Hall. More than 100 spectators listened for more than an hour as Goldstein recounted his experiences as a Jew in Nazi Germany.

Drawing on history and personal memories, Goldstein lectured on the history of Jewish settlement in Germany and described events leading up to the war.

Born in Poland, Goldstein spent his teen years growing up in Depression-era Essen, a city in the former Western Germany. "We were poor, but we didn't really notice. We were as poor as everyone else — the unemployment in Essen in those days was somewhere around 50 per cent," Goldstein said.

Goldstein described the laws of the time that restricted the number of Jews in high-school, and the worldwide aversion to accepting Jewish persons fleeing Nazi oppression.

"One month after Hitler took power in Germany, my father applied for Canadian and U.S. visas. We never heard a response from the Canadian embassy and the U.S. visa did not arrive until November of 1941," Goldstein said. Fortunately, his family was able to acquire British student visas and flee Germany shortly before the outbreak of the war, he recounted.

The majority of Goldstein's lecture dealt with the first major public uprising against the Jewish people in Germany. Kristallnacht, or "the night of broken glass," was an uprising in November of 1938, believed to have been orchestrated by the Nazi Party against German Jews, Goldstein explained.

Goldstein remembers the night as one of fear. His father took his family to the Polish Consulate in Dusseldorf where they were refused admittance. The Goldsteins spent the night standing in the vestibule of the consulate, as there were too many people to sit.

That night, in response to "Jewish aggression," 75 per cent of German synagogues were burned, and Jewish businesses and homes were vandalised, Goldstein said.

"Is there a moral for the world in what happened in Germany? Is there a moral there?" Goldstein asked. "If there is, I think that it's that it was not the first law against [the Jewish people] that began this horror, it was the first silence."

Queen's students responded positively to Goldstein's lecture. "It was very worthwhile. It is not very often you hear about the fear and discrimination before the Holocaust," said Vanessa Lauer, Arts '02.

"I found it a frank and fascinating look into what it is like dealing with hate," said Jascha Jabes, Arts '00. "I have been to many of these [lectures] and you'd think that hearing so much about what went on would dull its impact, but then it seems to be just the opposite."

Goldstein left the audience with a glimpse of the torment his memories gave him upon his return to Germany. "As I drove through the Black Forest, I had a terrible, terrible vision of seeing the shadows of Jews escaping from the concentration camps," he said.

Tough marks for grad entries

FYI

By MANDY MARRIOTT

In addition to having high admission standards, graduate programs at top Ontario schools receive a large number of applications each year.

Dean of Graduate Studies at Queen's Ron Anderson said there were roughly 3,500 applications sent to his department this year. Out of that number "roughly one out of four students were accepted," said Anderson.

While each department has specific requirements, applicants must meet the minimum requirement for all applicants into any program is a second class standing. Anderson said that although they will officially look at applicants with an average of 65 and above, "what we are really looking for is students with an A average."

Anderson said the number of students accepted into each program varies although it helps a student if they are familiar with the department they are applying to. "The personal touch makes a real difference," he said.

Graduate programs such as Law, Medicine and Business adhere to different criteria than other programs.

Unlike most graduate programs at Queen's, the Master of Business Administration program requires at least two years of work experience. Catherine Parcell, MBA career manager, said that in addition to the work experience, applicants must also score at least a 580 out of 800 on their GMAT with the average acceptance score being 648. This year there were 300 applicants to the MBA program and only 60 positions to be filled.

Parcell said "the program is very team-oriented." The MBA program is "looking for people who don't want to walk away from their science and engineering backgrounds, but would like to apply what they have learned to business." Just last week the program was ranked first for the second year in a row in Canadian Business magazine.

The MBA program at the University of Western Ontario is similar to Queen's in that students must have a minimum of two years work experience, although the average is five.

Communications Manager Maureen Terry said that this year 924 individuals applied and 215 were accepted. The average score on the GMAT standardized test of the class was 645 out of 800, and the average GPA was 3.3. In addition, the program requires the applicant to submit a transcript, a 500 word essay and a resumé.

Queen's Medicine also has a specific list of requirements for entrance into the program.

Mrs. Bartley, senior secretary in the School of Medicine, said that in order to be considered, students must obtain "a minimum of 10 [out of 12] in the verbal reasoning section of the MCAT [standardized test] and a nine or higher [out of 12] in the sciences section of the exam."

This year students needed to have a minimum grade point average of 3.56 to be interviewed. Once students have made it to this point, their interview is worth 50 per cent and their personal form is worth 50 per cent. This year there were approximately 1,400 applications and 75 positions were filled.

Mira Backo, president of the Aesculapian Society, said that compared to other Ontario Medical school programs, Queen's is unique because the "class size is small and there is a

Policy clarifies privacy rights

By STEPHANIE CARVIN

The University Registrar has released a guide detailing the Student and Applicant Record Policy, a new document that details both access to and release of student information. The policy is designed to complement the University's Access to Information and Protection of Privacy Guidelines.

"The policy has been a work in progress for two years," said Jo Brett, assistant to the university registrar. "It's only just been finalized."

"This policy defines the rights and obligations of students and of the university and its officers and staff in matters pertaining to student records and applications," said University Registrar Jo-Anne Bechtold in a press release. "The bottom line is the protection of students' privacy."

The Student and Applicant Record Policy does not change the existing university privacy policy. "It's not a new policy overriding the University Guidelines," said Brett. "What it does is clarify the university policy that has to do with the access to, release of, and the retention of student information."

By applying for admission to Queen's and by registering in courses at the university, students accept the university's right to collect personal information. Student governments are allowed limited access to this student data.

The policy provides guidelines about the security of information over the Internet and e-mail, the type of information the university should collect, the circumstances for release of personal information, and requests for additional protection of information.

The act was published as a supplement in the most recent edition of the Queen's Gazette and is available on the Internet at: <http://www.queensu.ca/registrar/policies/oursarp.html>. Any student or faculty member with questions about the Student and Applicant Record Policy are urged to contact the office of the Registrar via e-mail at oursarp@post.queensu.ca.

GPA important

high professor to student ratio. The class size is intimate and allows you to get questions and concerns addressed."

The University of Toronto's medical program is similar to Queen's in that it considers both academic and personal information. Bill Gregg, admissions and awards officer, said students need to submit three letters of reference, an autobiographical sketch and an essay. Although the department will consider students with a 3.6 GPA, a 3.8 is considered more competitive. In their MCAT scores, students need to score an eight in both the verbal reasoning section and in the sciences section. This year 1639 students applied and 177 were accepted.

Unlike Queen's and Toronto, the medical school at Western is more concerned with academics than personal information when considering applicants for the program. This year 1624 students applied and 96 were accepted.

Admissions Officer Barbara Radford emphasized that students need to have obtained at least a 3.5 GPA average in their final year and one other year in order to be considered. In those two years the student has to take five full courses to be considered eligible. In addition, students must also obtain a nine on the biological sciences part of the MCAT, a nine on the verbal reasoning section, and an eight on the physical sciences section. Some students will also be asked to attend an interview.

Walkhome fees pass

per cent spoiled. Ryan Graham, Sci '00, placed the ENGERAMA question on the ballot. "[ENGERAMA's] main objective is to have a club or team where the focus of the club is practical design work," he explained.

Graham was not disappointed by the results of the referendum. "Actually I'm pretty happy... It's good for a team that didn't exist yet. I am confident that we can be quite successful by the spring referendum," he said.

Both Walkhome fees passed. The mandatory summer Walkhome fee of $2.00 was passed with 90.0 per cent support and the $1.00 increase in the mandatory fall/winter fee was approved with 71.7 per cent of the vote.

"We were very pleased," said Mark Fam, Walkhome's assistant manager. "We're glad to see that students really do care about [Walkhome]."

Fam said increasing the fee would allow Walkhome to "run at an optimal level" and "increase availability... We want to make it as accessible as possible."

The Queen's Journal mandatory fee of $2.50 was also passed with 77.2 per cent of students approving its continuation. "I'm really happy that Queen's students are continuing to support campus media," said Tara Mansbridge, co-editor-in-chief of The Journal. "It shows they value free speech at Queen's," she said.

Other fees that passed the referendum include the Queen's Bands mandatory fee of $3.00, and the Sexual Assault Crisis Centre's $1.00 fee. Established opt-out fees include a $0.95 fee for the Queen's Debating Union and $0.75 to support HIV and AIDS Regional Services.

The referendum also included a plebiscite, which is a survey of interests, and is not binding upon the AMS. The plebiscite on the ballot asked students about the AMS health plan. Of the voters, 45.8 per cent said they opted out of the plan while 52.7 per cent remained in the plan. There was 60.3 per cent support for research into dental coverage and 63.0 per cent support for research into the addition of a vision care coverage element to the plan.

The second section of the plebiscite asked students to rank their priorities for capital allocation. Student awards/bursaries came out as the top priority, followed by Faculty/School projects, libraries, creating a multi-purpose facility for students and the International Study Centre.

Engineers enjoy enchanted night at Sci Formal

BY RENEE HUANG

Saturday's Sci Formal saw Grant Hall transformed into a palace of vaulted chambers, seductive rooms of enchantment and a ballroom complete with two working fountains and miniature waterfalls.

The formal, a century-old tradition, was decorated by graduating engineers using a budget of almost $60,000. Engineering students from other years volunteered to take part in the extravaganza, donning costumes for the parts of genes, snake charmers and palace workers.

A dimly lit corridor covered in painted mosaics led party goers into an unrecognizable Kingston Hall.

Seven theme rooms complete with open bars and platters heaped high with sandwiches branched off the main hall, which was transformed into a marketplace scene and decorated with paper maché creations reminiscent of Aladdin.

In an entertainment room off the main corridor, Michael Hui, Sci '99, and Viola Lui, ArtSci

'99, enjoyed the musical talents of Jon Coakley and his band. Even though the night was young, Hui said the formal was already "beyond [his] expectations."

"After 35 hours of construction, it's exceeded my expectations... I love it."

— Brian Menzel, Sci '99

"I started [getting ready] at nine o'clock this morning," Lui laughed. Hui and Lui agreed that they had a long night ahead of them, one that would require pacing.

Travel Agent opened the musical set in the main ballroom, playing to a crowd still warming up on their drinks from multiple open bars. The next band, the Johnny Favorite Swing Orchestra, injected energy into the crowd and had couples swinging and jiving all over the dance floor.

"After 35 hours of construction, it's exceeded my expectations... I love it," exclaimed

Brian Menzel, Sci '99. "For four years of engineering, you work your ass off waiting for this night."

"I'm having a great time," said Melissa Clarke, Sci '99, who designed the paper maché tiger and cobra. "It's like a finale. Four years of hard work — this is it," she continued. "I've never been to [the Sci Formal], I only came to my own."

"It's an amazing fantasy set and nobody else gets to see it," said Jennifer Haverhals, another graduating engineer.

Haverhals had the foresight to begin her formal preparations far in advance. "I started growing my hair eight months ago," she said.

The overall consensus for favourite room was the Jungle Room, draped in tropical plants and sinewy vines, with its own private stage for setting the atmosphere.

Another Kingston Hall room featured a desert theme with two lifelike camels. The walls were covered with photos, while a continuous slide show played. Ali, recent winner of the Alfie's spin off, scratched in the nearby Treasure Trove.

At the Lela Camilla Café, the only non-alcoholic bar at the formal, spirits were high. Erica Angel, Sci '02, one of the two workers tending the bar, said, "It's been busy considering it's a non-alcoholic bar."

Another volunteer, Scott Affleck, Sci '00, spent the night working at the beer, cider and wine bar. "[I liked] talking to people, seeing my friends, listening to the tunes, just being social," he said.

"It's kind of cool to see it come together like this. Hopefully next year it's going to be the same for us," Affleck added.

"It turned out better than I thought it would," said Mike Shanahan, Sci '99, who began putting in construction hours on September 20. Although he spent all of 45 minutes getting ready, he said Agrabadababwa was "definitely worth the hours [of preparation]."

"It's really good being out with all your friends you've known for four years... It makes you appreciate your last year," Shanahan said.

By 2 a.m., the crowd was wearing thin as party-goers contributed to the formal's deconstruction. As people carted away souvenir paper maché palm trees, animals and the giant Sultan seated in the hall, the fantasy evening slowly returned to reality.

Geography Scholar-In-Residence

Dr. Amy Leventer, a visiting scholar in the department of geography, will also be a Scholar-in-Residence in Chown Hall from November 16 - 19. Her teaching disciplines include marine biology and oceanography and her goal is to have students develop an understanding and appreciation of the complexity of Earth system science. She will be giving two public talks. "Hot Times in a Cold Place: Global Warming and Antarctica" will be held in room 327 of Ellis Hall on November 17, at 11:30 a.m. "Solar Variability and Climate: Evidence from the Palmer Deep, Antarctica" will be held in Mackintosh-Corry Hall, room D207, on November 18 at 2 p.m. An informal drop-in session centering around the exciting prospects for women in science will be held November 17 from 2 - 4 p.m. (location not yet determined). For more information, contact Debra Christie at 545-6944.

National Child Day

Better Beginnings for Kingston Children and the North Kingston Community Health Centre are recognizing national child day with "A Celebration of Children." The event will begin in Confederation Park at 5 p.m. and move to City Hall. All are welcome. For more information contact Wendy Christopher at 542-2835.

Holiday bereavement support

The Community Bereavement Support Program is hosting "Preparing for the Holidays" on November 23, at 7:30 p.m. in the Ongwanada Resource Centre. The evening will include a panel of people sharing experiences and suggestions for coping with the death of their loved ones. For more information call Deborah at 634-0130, ext. 306.

Mental health law seminar

The Mental Health Law Education Project is hosting an afternoon of information designed to help distinguish between the law and myths surrounding mental health care. The event will be held November 25 from 1 - 5 p.m. at Hotel Dieu Hospital. Contact Janet Joynt at 549-5253, ext. 30, for more information.

Local volunteer opportunities

There are several volunteer positions available through the Community Volunteer Centre. The centre is looking for a volunteer to organize the fifth annual National Volunteer Week Youth Writing Contest and needs someone to help out with general office work for a half day per week. Also, the centre's Tax Clinic team is looking for new members with the ability to prepare tax returns.

Out There

Relief packages to Russia

Canada is preparing relief packages for the citizens of North Russia in an attempt to avert starvation and mass evacuation. The Russian Aboriginal people are among the hardest hit by this crisis. Other countries are also responding quickly to the overseas crisis, including the United States.

Canada under pressure

Intense pressure is being received by Canada from its nuclear allies — the United States, France, and Britain to vote against the United Nations request for all nuclear weapons to be abolished. Countries are fearful that Canada will undermine political solidarity of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The elimination of nuclear weapons is supported throughout the Liberal caucus.

Iraq refuses weapon inspection

Iraq's refusal to permit weapon inspections required by the U.N. could result in a surprise cruise missile attack by the United States. At least seven warships among the 20 currently stationed on the gulf are capable of launching the attack. Though Washington has stated that a peaceful resolution is preferable, military action is possible.

Health week to show students range of choices

BY SARAH CROSBIE

Whether you are interested in contraception, alternative therapy or finding the best running shoes, the 1998 Queen's University Health Fair promises to inform students on the services and information available to them.

The Health Fair will take place in the John Deutsch University Centre next Wednesday between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m.

This year's Health Fair will focus on giving students the tools and information to make educated decisions about their health needs. According to Sophia Ikura and Sarah McLenna, two co-chairs of the Health Fair, Queen's students are, on the whole, healthy.

"There's a growing trend for taking responsibility for your own health," Ikura stated.

A recent student poll identified alternative medicine, sexual activity, nutritional needs, stress management, physical health and alcohol information as the six major areas students were interested in and needed to improve in their lives, Ikura and McLenna said.

The fair will bring together all health science faculties along with Student Health, the Peer Health group, the Aboriginal Health Centre and the team for Educating Students on Substances. McLenna stressed the importance of the different groups' participation. "Students need to know what resources are out there," she said.

"We're bringing them to campus and making students aware," Ikura added.

This student-operated fair, which has been running annually for 11 years, will feature booths on both levels of the JDCU. It will include free yoga and aerobic demonstrations, a nutrition booth with free fruit, tips on stress management and answers to the most frequently asked questions about sexual performance. Talks with local alternative physicians and therapists will be available and each booth will give students the chance to acquire interactive money, allowing them to buy prizes from local businesses.

One of the highlights of the fair will be Tom Stanley, Alma Mater Society president, illustrating how to put a condom on a greased cucumber while blindfolded.

Police nightmare

LIVING IN THE COUNTRY VOTED number one in the world by the United Nations does not guarantee all the freedoms one would expect. Despite a strong commitment to civil liberties expressed in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Canadian police are allowed to strip-search anyone they detain without demonstrating a just cause. Since no statistics or hard records are kept, police say they have no way of knowing how often this arbitrary power is used — or abused. A recent spate of articles in the media, however, points to strip-searches having become routine, sometimes even for minor offenses such as unpaid traffic tickets. This seems at odds with a legal system that places so much emphasis on protecting the right of your property from police searches. The police need a warrant from a judge to search your house, but they are given indiscriminate power to search your person and even, on occasion, your body cavities.

However, many of the victims that complained of being arbitrarily strip-searched in cities such as Calgary, Toronto and Vancouver are far from being dangerous criminals. The charges laid ranged from trivial offenses such as being late filing papers with Immigration Canada to a dispute over a restaurant bill.

The police need a warrant from a judge to search your house, but they are given indiscriminate power to search your person and even, on occasion, your body cavities.

Police don't keep records because they do not distinguish between a strip-search and any other kind of search — a search is a search, said one police spokesperson. Until this attitude is changed, in policy and law, the police will not be held accountable for abuses of this power and more Canadians will become victims of the police.

Boxing decision bites

NOT EVEN THE INHUMAN savagery that took a piece out of Evander Holyfield's ear is enough to permanently bar Mike Tyson from the boxing ring. The decision by the Nevada Athletics Commission to reinstate Tyson's license, two weeks ago, impugns the credibility of the sport itself. It is quite clear, however, that money is more important than credibility in the world of professional boxing. Tyson is not such a big draw despite his violent, criminal past but probably because of it. Having already accumulated $140 million from the six fights he has fought since release from prison in 1995, Tyson seems able to command a greater purse each time he transgresses another law or taboo. The economic realities of sport dictated leniency for Tyson's brutal act last June 28 because Tyson is too valuable to keep out of the ring.

This seems par for the course in the professional sporting world where violent behavior is often encouraged instead of being punished. From Latrell Sprewell strangling his coach to Gary Suter almost ending Paul Kariya's career in the NHL, a systematic pattern of violence has only increased the ratings for professional sports. If we are going to retain any standards in sports, a line must be drawn between acceptable and unacceptable conduct. Mike Tyson crossed over that line when he spit out his mouthpiece and went for Evander Holyfield's ear.

When I see an actual flesh and blood worker in conflict with his natural enemy, the policeman, I do not have to say which side I am on.

Controlling our bodies

PEOPLE WHO KNOW ME MIGHT say that I'm slim. Others may say I am skinny. But those who joke about my thinness as being anorexia are seriously mistaken. Anorexia is not a disorder to make light of. It affects far too many young women to throw careless comments around. At Queen's you can look around and see the odd woman jogging down the street, determination blazing in her sunken eyes, spindly legs and arms pumping. I have noticed people in my classes drop sizes and pounds, and wonder with concern if "she" too has succumbed to an eating disorder.

Don't be so focused on calories, fat and calories. Splurge on ice cream.

There is a myth that controlling our bodies through exercise and food will build character and a healthy social life. But where is the line between a genuine interest in improving personal health and doing serious damage to our bodies? Where does discipline collide with obsession?

Eating disorders are not even just "women's problems." Men, too, can be struck by the disease. This is a social disease. We caused it. Society, media, images, ideals are what made a close friend of mine in high school consistently eat one tiny bite from her sandwich and throw it out when she thought no one would notice. This would happen day after day. This friend existed under the warped perception that she was not attractive in the body that was naturally hers. She would continually try to squeeze herself into clothes that were three sizes too small, and suck her stomach in at the sight of her reflection. People would interpret it as vanity. Only a handful of us knew better.

I don't have a problem with being skinny. Or thin. Or slender. But anorexic I am not. I have a friend who is battling an eating disorder, only she doesn't know it. She's seen countless specialists and doctors, and been on numerous specialty diets designed to cure her mysterious "stomach problem." In the meantime, my friends and I watched helplessly as she dropped 20 pounds in half a year. What she and her parents refuse to acknowledge — perhaps out of fear, but mostly out of denial — is that she does not have a problem in her stomach. It's a problem in her head.

We have to watch out for each other here. It's our job to keep an eye on our housemates, girlfriends, friends and acquaintances. Don't be so focused on calories, fat and exercise. Splurge on ice cream. Have a "fat" day and eat all the "wrong" foods. Let's stop chastising people for being the "wrong" shape and clue into the fact that a real world includes real people.

Remembrance for whom?

WHAT DOES Remembrance Day have to do with me? Although this question seems simple, it is perhaps one of the most perplexing questions I have ever asked myself.

It is true that wars affected lives of Canadians of all ages, all races and all social classes. Both women and men served in various fields, from fighting on the front line to working in the factories. Even though I am a proud Canadian, even though I have worn a poppy every year, and even though I have presided over different ceremonies, I felt a nagging question that I have never answered: as an individual, as a non-white male, does Remembrance Day have anything to offer me?

Some of my friends have suggested it is my duty to love my country and therefore celebrate Remembrance Day. I've been told over and over that 100,000 Canadians died for our freedom. I have read that they gave their lives so that we may live in peace. But I am not a blind patriot. Nor am I unaware of other conflicts that disgrace their memory.

Do I blindly wave my flag and forget that people like me were oppressed during the wars? Do I forget that people like me were herded out of their homes? Do I forget how Canadians stole fellow Canadians' belongings? Do I forget the hate, forget the humiliation, forget the pain of deportation in order for you to celebrate a holiday?

Words like civic obligation dissolve against the malevolence of hate. Yet, I recognize that sacrifice is meaningless without remembrance. Far too often, the nation as a whole takes for granted the freedoms all Canadians enjoy. Those freedoms were paid for with lives of others few of us actually knew. But in order to preserve their memory, and thus their sacrifice in the memories of future generations, we must confront the deprivations of the past.

It is a shame that more than 100,000 Canadians died.

It is also a shame that Canadians were scattered, stolen, separated from their families, and deported as other Canadians looked on and did nothing.

I claim not to speak for all Canadians, nor Canadians of my colour. I do not ever speak for all colored men. I speak only for myself. My race, my sex and my individuality are all part of me. And this individuality is indivisible. I wear a poppy not because it is my duty and obligation; it is because I choose to make it my responsibility to never forget.

For that reason, the answer to my original question is: yes. Yes, Remembrance Day has something to offer me. You may already know this. If so, I am proud to be among you. If not, let me share something that you may have missed: I wear a poppy because it is my responsibility to remember those who died for a cause, lived for a cause and most importantly, those who were blameless for living and dying.

As war veterans disappear from society's landscape, there are fewer and fewer standard bearers left to carry the torch of remembrance. Each new generation takes society further away from the reality of war. The reality is that our country is maturing in culture. It is no longer feasible to continue to remember only those who had a direct involvement in the wars. Veterans of both sides should be remembered. Others who indirectly supported should be remembered. The innocent victims of war should be remembered. Simply put, the memory of the meaning of all the sacrifices given and taken should rest within our collective national consciousness. Such worthy traditions will live on only if there is a consolidated movement to which that torch can be passed (and received) voluntarily.

I truly now know why wearing a poppy is the least I can do to remember. Do you know why you wear yours?

Mark Salvador, Arts '00, wears his poppy close to his heart and his head.

Clinton nobody's hero

Dear Editors,

J.C. Bellinger's article in last Friday's Journal was extremely naive and reached some seriously flawed conclusions.

He began with an attack on the Republicans "witch-hunt" of Clinton, saying it was based on a misplaced and unjustified crusade of Puritanical morality. Most might agree with this view. However, he continued to state that despite his flaws, Clinton will be remembered as a great President due to his "sterling" international record and commitment to political virtue.

Clinton has created a large, dangerous ineptitude in foreign policy.

This is absolutely preposterous. Many have complained the Starr investigation has compromised the power, authority and vigilance of Clinton in pursuing his foreign policy goals. Unfortunately, the deepest and continuing failure of Clinton is precisely that he has not exercised power, authority and vigilance in international affairs and shows neither the talent nor credibility to do so in whatever time is left to his Presidency.

Tell me, J.C., are you content that six years of Clinton policy have left Saddam Hussein a far more powerful leader and dreaded terrorist than when Clinton first came to office? How does his "vigilance" strike you as Saddam once again bars U.N. inspection of his biological and chemical weapon factories, laughing at Clinton's hollow threats of action?

Letters to the Editors

How about the Balkans? Could you tell me what the hell American policy is? If so, please tell the U.S. diplomats who have no idea. Clinton, could have stopped all the bloodshed there years ago if he'd insisted on the partition of Bosnia, seceding from Yugoslavia into Muslim, Serbian and Croatian areas.

Instead, he trotted along after Germany and other mindless European nations trying to make a unified country that was and remains a mirage.

Or perhaps it's his genius in deciding to continue the disastrous anti-proliferation policy of the Reagan-Bush years which allows American and foreign business to help sharpen the aim and range of missiles for China, and so for Beijing's customer list, including such "humanitarian" nations such as Iran and Syria?

Clinton has created a large, dangerous ineptitude in foreign policy. That reality is clearly understood by leaders all over the world — particularly those that wish the US evil. This may not be grounds for impeachment. But it is no ground either for suggesting that anyone should praise him or fear for world security if he is removed — or summons up the honour to resign from the Presidency he maintained through his own reckless instability.

Remembrance Day celebrations incomplete

Dear Editors,

While attending the Remembrance Day services here in Kingston I heard a lot of talk about WWI, WWII, Korea, and peacekeeping. It came to mind that there was a noticeable absence, being the Spanish Civil War. Not once at either service I attended was the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion mentioned.

My god, these 1,200 men conquered great hurdles just to get to Spain to fight the fascists and when they got there they suffered heavy losses.

When the International Brigades were withdrawn only 600 Mac-Paps were left and many had suffered horrible wounds. Incredibly when WWII broke out many of these men were among the first to enlist, this after being criminalized by their own government. Many more Mac-Paps died in WWII and now it's estimated that only about 25-30 Spanish Civil War vets survive across Canada.

I had the great fortune of meeting two Mac-Paps a number of years ago but unfortunately both have passed away. I wish I could have recorded their stories so that their fight would not be forgotten. Even the government doesn't think their fight was important. Right now the stories of vets from WWI, WWII, and Korea are being recorded so that they will be preserved for the future. The Mac-Paps were left out because, as a government official stated, they fought in a war Canada did not support.

I encourage everyone to find out if there is a Spanish Civil War vet in their town and get their experiences down on tape. This is a battle that is quickly being lost. Another thing you can do is find out names of vets from your town who died in Spain and fight for their recognition. Get a memorial dedicated to them, make sure their names are along those who

QEA in the house

Dear Editors,

[Re: Ryan J. North's "QEA a few steps behind"]

Sweet, sweet Ryan. The Huevos Rancheros concert you referred to in your letter was actually not organized by the Queen's Entertainment Agency. In regards to your interest in seeing more pop and rock on campus, the Philosopher Kings and Emm Gryner are performing at Grant Hall on Thursday, November 19. Mmm... Canadian pop! I realize that you had the feelin' for Pure heelin', but it is difficult to bring in every band that students are interested in. However, please e-mail us at qea@ams.queensu.ca with preferences for bands you would like to see next semester. Your feedback is important to us, and we'll do our best to provide entertainment that you will enjoy.

In response to your comment of the QEA being "bandwagon hoppers," we are the first campus organization to provide hip-hop at Queen's University. Although you don't dig the beats 'n rhythms, have an open mind — many students are blissfully happy to finally see hip hop on campus. Rather than being "a few steps behind," I believe that we're "one step beyond!"

Each step is significant

Dear Editors,

Allow me to clarify some points raised by Mr. Clarke and Mr. Aggus last Friday in their letters to the Editors. These were in response to my Opinions article "Racism Within Us, Around Us."

Systemic racism is a collection of seemingly insignificant behaviours whose summary effect can be catastrophically unjust towards visible minorities.

Mr. Aggus indicates that the examples I have used to support the existence of systemic racism at Queen's could arguably be isolated or perhaps even unrelated to racism.

Though this may well be true, his protest demonstrates an ignorance of systemic racism as a concept. I apologize for not having defined this term earlier. Systemic racism is a collection of seemingly insignificant behaviours (belonging to the majority race) whose summary effect can be catastrophically unjust towards visible minorities. Its existence can rarely be proved by example alone. It is rooted in the revisionist national history to which most of white Canada subscribes (e.g. 95 per cent of Canadians believe slavery has never existed in Canada. Wrong.) As such, Mr. Aggus' comments fail to exonerate Queen's of racial wrongdoing.

In addition, Mr. Aggus fails to note that I direct my rage towards dedicated racists only. His suggestion that my 'McCarthyist witch hunt' is a root cause of racism thus reduces to the following: the attempt to expose die hard racists causes racism. Is it just me or does this sound like an impasse?

Finally, he leaves us with the notion that we are still waiting for something 'really bad' to happen on the racism front. In my opinion there is no such thing as an insignificant battle against racism. I would be interested to discover what he considers the threshold for 'really bad' racism. Is it losing a job over race? Getting beat up, or killed, perhaps? Get back to me on that one.

As for Mr. Clarke, I will respond in point form for the sake of brevity:
 • My opinion is that systemic racism exists at Queen's. I'm not sure how you missed this. Even so, it was the decision of The Journal's editorial staff that the article should appear in the Opinions section, as was the decision to include a copy of the poster.

• I didn't put the posters up. Try not to make inferences that stand to embarrass you in front of thousands.

• The article was on racism, not Burma. You're synthetic concern for the Burmese situation is insulting. Have you ever been to a Free Burma meeting?

• My article was intended to make people question themselves and to raise awareness, not make new contributions to the discussion on racism. In short, I was rattling your cage. Looks like it worked.

Watch your tone

Dear Editors,

I am writing in response to the letter 'Let's get to the heart of the matter' (Nov 6 Journal) by Momoona Haile Mariam, Public Relations Officer, African and Caribbean Students Association (ACSA). There are three points in particular that caught my eye as seriously problematic that I would like to address.

The first point is the notion that in order to "have a productive dialogue on racism... we cannot have exchanges based on how we feel about the 'tone of a letter'" (Mariam, Nov 6, Journal). I would argue that the 'tone of a letter' often speaks important volumes about its author. Marshall McLuhan's idea of the medium of communication as a representation of its content suggests that the forum and the aesthetic of a text have very important effects on its interpretation. The beauty of language is both in its massive diversity of highly specific words, and in its ability to represent so much more than just the words selected.

Letters to the Editors

To downplay this is a serious fault in virtually any argument.

I agree with Mariam in advocating the establishment of a 'productive dialogue on racism,' but suggest that it should certainly include an acute awareness of aesthetic, tone and form. I am appalled that any university-level collective would see it otherwise.

It's time to establish a forum for discussion, with genuine respect paid to differing opinions and to the people who stand behind them.

The second point is the insinuation that Nalini Naidoo's letter 'Responses Show Lack Of Awareness' (October 23) was in any way shape or form 'quite simple.' When I called her letter 'intellectually condescending and self-aggrandizing,' I felt that it was, and blatantly so. Reading such tripe insults my intelligence. ACSA has now tried to swing its weight into the matter by calling this point a degeneration of the discussion of racism.

If Naidoo's brand of moral-possessive lecturing truly passes as 'the heart of the matter,' then it's high time that we degenerate this farce to its roots in order to establish a true forum for discussion, with genuine respect paid to differing opinions and to the people who stand behind them. ACSA could well be an excellent repository of knowledge, sensitivity and insight into this matter, but factually and aesthetically her letter spoke to me and others in an entirely different way and contradicted her intent.

The third point is the hypocrisy in Naidoo's and Mariam's letters. My first letter was written in hopes of reinforcing that disagreement does not necessarily indicate a lack of education and understanding. I critiqued Naidoo's letter because it did not at all account for this fact. Mariam's response to this was an insulting pamphlet-like retreat to the ideals of anti-racism, as if to alienate me and 'those who feel as [I do]' from them. People who truly feel like I do fully respect these ideals; we just do not always agree with the actions of those who act in the name of the cause. And if ACSA's idea of respecting an alternate perspective is changing the context of the argument and running from specific acts and individuals to hide behind general ideals, then I am truly ashamed.

Again, it is not so much an issue of whether or not I agree with the letters, but rather demonstrating that the ideologies do not match up very well with the acts and arguments. I echo Naidoo's and Mariam's wishes that sensitivity and awareness to issues of racism and culture be enhanced as a result of our banter, but I also hope that they will consider the points outlined in this letter.

"O my body, make of me always a man who questions!" — Frantz Fanon

Join the fight

Dear Editors,

I am writing this letter to commend and enrich Andrew Toms's article "Racism with us, around us."

I would firstly like to applaud his efforts in pursuing and championing for human rights and political reform in Burma. There is no nobler cause that places itself in direct opposition to these military dictatorships, and against the hegemony of exploitative western capitalism in the third world. A battlefield, that the majority of the world population lives within, yet a system that some of us at Queen's seem quite happy to study, live within, graduate and then reap the benefits of.

The general apathy towards engagement in social and political reform of the third world nations by the majority of Queen's students is disturbing.

This general apathy towards engagement in genuine social and political reform of the third world nations demonstrated by the majority of Queen's students is disturbing enough. Let alone the deliberate attempts of a select individual or group, that finds it necessary to rip down the posters that advertise a group workshop on the subject of human rights.

Whether these perpetrators are white or Burmese, with direct interests in seeing the perpetuation of such a military dictatorship, or continual oppression of third world people; you are one and the same, just separated by geography.

I don't care where you come from, but let me draw the line.

There are some of you who are willing to ensure the status quo of global monopoly style capitalism, and the autocratic governments of third world countries it instills. It ensures your hierarchical status on top of the world. It is your time to reap the profits — throw your head straight into the chocolate fudge cake of life, and eat your fill. After all, anybody in the same position would act the same: it's human nature! Well you can take your conception of life, economics, social mismanagement and stick it where the sun don't shine — because you got a fight on your hands.

There are a lot of us in this world who are educated, determined, politically active and will be damned if we are not going to fight through legal and non-violent means, championing for the basic human rights deserved of every person that calls this planet "home." Not only do we come with the rhetoric of equality and social justice, but instilled with a deep sense of commitment to these values — more so than the value of our own lives.

I humbly join hands with Andrew Toms and appeal to our student government to address this issue with a statement and possible investigation directed towards the systemic ripping down of "Free Burma" posters.

Breadth of learning

Dear Editors,

In response to Andrew Smith's "The end of the liberal arts," I would firstly like to defend my enrollment in a Bachelor of Arts (Honours) program. Despite his suggestion that liberal arts exist only "for lack of something better to do," I deliberately chose the discipline Political Studies because of its opportunity for discussion and debate; it has taught me to think critically, to express myself intelligently and to write with both passion and clarity. These skills are far from "superfluous and medieval."

There is a great deal of cross-discipline education to be had at Queen's.

Furthermore, Smith fails to recognize the opportunities already available to liberal arts students for directed reading, thesis papers, and independent research. Especially as a fourth-year student, I have been given surprisingly little direction in my studies.

History had certainly shown us that a great many minds excelled and in fact flourished without a university education, but I question whether this was by choice. Perhaps instead of discrediting the university experience, we should be praising the opportunities open to us that were denied to intellectuals of the past.

As society moves rapidly towards a more interactive, global network, I question Smith's suggestion that "the number of 'I always wanted to take time to study Byzantium in depth and now I can' people would be more than balanced out by the number of people who presently study the humanities." Foregoing the communitarian aspect currently afforded by our universities in favour of isolating students and their thoughts would be costly to intellectual development. Consider how much stronger John Stuart Mill would have been for articulating and defending his views in a classroom filled with other great minds!

Finally, Smith suggests that the opportunities for interdisciplinary studies within the humanities are negligible. I encourage him to pursue elective credits (70% of the nineteen necessary for a BAH) in fields other than his concentration. Let me assure you that there is a great deal of cross-discipline education to be had at Queen's! After all, what better has Smith to do?

Time to learn

WHEN WE WERE LITTLE, we were given many rules from our parents and our teachers about how to live in the bad world outside our homes. They told us never to talk to strangers. They told us to look both ways before crossing the street. And as we got older, the rules evolved into guidelines about how to act within society. Just say no. Safe sex or no sex. Don't drink and drive.

Let's discuss the last guideline about drinking and driving. Let's talk candidly about what it really means, who it affects and why we care. And then, maybe after that, let's hope and wish that it stopped at least one person from driving under the influence. And, perhaps if we're bold enough, let's hope that it saved a life, or some lives, or possibly a whole family.

Most of us have heard the arguments against drinking and driving. Not only have we heard them, but we understand them. They're not difficult to grasp. So the message slides off our backs, because we know we wouldn't drive under the influence, and we're sure that in those few instances in which we drove with a little alcohol in us, we were below the legal limit.

There isn't much that I know in this world, but I can tell you one idea which I feel pretty comfortable addressing. That is the fact that it only takes one of us to forget the gravity of the rule, and it only takes one moment of irrationality to shorten another person's entire life. It only takes one of us to be convinced that we are okay. Only one of us to think that the hassle of calling a cab or asking a friend to pick us up isn't worth it. It only takes one person to take away another's life. And that one event can alter the happiness and confidence of more people than many of us can bear to imagine.

Mark Wilson and his entire immediate family were killed on July 12, 1998 by a drunk driver. Three generations of a family. One drunk driver. And now friends and remaining family are forced to grow along with their loss lingering thoughts of 'if only.' His girlfriend, his housemates, his friends, his teachers and his professors were shocked horribly this summer. Life became a little more cynical and a lot more painful.

But here is where we can all work together to show that there can be some tangible healing for us all. We all have a responsibility to be safe and to help keep one another safe. We are all susceptible to drunk drivers. They do not pick and choose who they kill. These tragedies are blind to their victims. Those of us who choose to drink, whether often or not, are at least remotely capable of becoming the very image we easily despise. Perhaps here is where we can find unity among us. We can surrender to the fact that we are, first of all, mortal, and second, that drunk drivers — however detestable we want to make them — can easily be our neighbours, our friends, anybody we pass along the street, even ourselves. This once abstract fight has now become very personal.

Beginning Monday, November 16, green ribbons will be distributed on campus in support of a Queen's student awareness campaign on drinking and driving. The event signifies a call for the end of this craziness and is done in remembrance of our friend, Mark Wilson, who should be walking around campus with the rest of us.

Let $x = \text{God}$

By ANGELA JAMES

THE CONCEPTS OF "FAITH" AND "logic" are often viewed as being at odds with each other in terms of religious beliefs. Faith is generally considered an unquestioning belief, whereas logic is defined as correct reasoning based on criteria of valid thought. The essence of religious belief is often assumed to require a strong element of faith without substantial logical proof that the beliefs are valid.

The assumption of the incompatibility of faith and logic within the realm of religious belief was parodied by Douglas Adams in The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy (see side bar).

The works of William S. Hatcher, a philosopher, mathematician and proponent of the Baha'i faith, emerge as paradoxical in the light of this incompatibility. Through the use of logic and mathematical reasoning, Hatcher asserts that he has proven the existence of God, confirming the very foundation of his religious belief. In his recent presentation at Queen's University, sponsored by the Baha'i organization, he summarized his proof and outlined the major assumptions on which it was based.

The search for a mathematically-based proof of God's existence has spanned centuries. Aristotle developed a mathematical proof that attempted to demonstrate the presence of a universal cause. In his theorem, he first assumed the existence of some entity. If this entity was caused, it must have been caused by an entity different from itself. Similarly, this entity that caused that first entity must either have been caused by another entity or uncaused. If there was no uncaused entity in the universe, the chain of entities and causes would extend backwards without bound. Since Aristotle did not believe that an infinite regression was possible, he considered this theorem to be proof of an ultimate uncaused cause. Through the principle of transitivity, where the cause of an entity is also the cause of every entity further in the chain, Aristotle concluded that this uncaused cause was universal.

Later advances in mathematics determined that a major assumption of this theorem is not necessarily valid. Aristotle did not believe that there could be an infinite regression of causes or entities. Though this concept would have undoubtedly been difficult to imagine, the presence of an infinitely regressing discretely ordered set without a minimal element is possible and is exemplified by the existence of negative integers. Therefore, even though Aristotle's theorem appeared to be valid given the knowledge available at the time, it has since been found to contain errors in logic.

Another individual who made major contributions to the logical proof of God's existence was a 10th century Muslim prophet, Avicenna. His theorem attempted to prove that there was exactly one universal uncaused cause. He began his theorem by assuming that the universe was non-empty, or composed of

"Oh dear, I hadn't thought of that."

In Douglas Adams' The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy, the problem of people of different species understanding each other is solved with the use of the Babel fish, a wholly remarkable creature. By placing this fish in your ear, you can immediately comprehend any sort of spoken communication. Adams writes:

"Now it is such a bizarrely improbable coincidence that anything so mind-bogglingly useful could have evolved by chance that some thinkers have chosen to see it as a final and clinching proof of the non-existence of God.

"The argument goes something like this: I refuse to prove that I exist, says

God, for proof denies faith, and without faith I am nothing.

"But, says Man, the Babel fish is a dead giveaway, isn't it? It could not have evolved by chance. It proves you exist, and so therefore, by your own arguments, you don't. QED.

"Oh dear, says God, I hadn't thought of that, and promptly vanishes in a puff of logic."

Adams later states that "most leading theologians claim that this argument is a load of dingo's kidneys..."

Grok: A Science Opinion

By ANDREW PARKER

GROWING UP FASCINATED BY science, I spent a generous portion of my free time reading any book that promised to elucidate the world that so intrigued me. I remember quite clearly the day when I picked up a worn copy of Charles Darwin's The Origin of Species and began to delve into a world that has not since released me from its grasp. Darwin's theory of evolution, once read and understood, changes the way in which you view the world and your own existence.

The theory of evolution is profound for the very fact that it eliminates faith and supposition and spirituality and it focuses on the truth. It is truth based on evidence, and it is quite irrefutable. I believe that science's general belief about Darwin's theory can be summed up by the eminent geneticist Theodosius Dobzhansky: "Nothing in biology makes sense except in the light of evolution."

Although evolutionary theory is the foundation for all modern life sciences, its importance is being undermined on many fronts by those who would attack that which they fail to grasp.

The basic premise of Darwin's theory is quite simple. It states that there is inherent variation in specific traits in an organism. If these traits confer an advantage in the given environment, then the organism is more likely to pass on these traits to its young. These offspring then carry the genetic advantage into the next generation.

It is remarkably logical. With similar logic we can explain how the eye evolved, why pregnant women get morning sickness and even why we die. These explanations are accessible and meaningful to anyone who would take the time to read them. It is not biological complexity that hinders a more general understanding of evolution but rather it is something all together more imposing. That which causes people to avert their eyes from the truth is nothing other than the light of religious faith.

Darwin in the raw

You do not have to be an atheist to be a scientist, and yet science is increasingly portrayed as an anti-religion.

Two examples will illustrate how religion has confounded the most basic principle of life. I was told today by a friend at Queen's that her professor had asked in class, "Why do they still teach Darwin? His theory doesn't explain anything. God can still exist."

In a similar vein, an article published in Toronto's Globe and Mail stated that "Natural selection describes the way organisms that already exist adapt to change in habitats that already exist, but it is silent on how the process begins."

These statements frustrate me, as they do many scientists, for two reasons: first, the theory of evolution says nothing about the existence of God. It is merely a tool for explaining biological phenomena. Secondly, this theory can explain all of the fundamental questions that everyone believes are beyond its scope. For those who think that we cannot explain "how the process begins," I suggest reading Richard Dawkins's 1976 work The Selfish Gene in which he explains in detail the evolution of "life" from the primordial soup of three billion years ago.

As I mentioned previously, evolution and natural selection are not theories about the existence or absence of God. Although fact and faith have become antonyms in our increasingly dichotomous world, they do not share the same realm. You do not have to be an atheist to be a scientist, and yet science is increasingly portrayed as an anti-religion. Yes, science does disprove certain religious notions: we know the world was not created in seven days, and Adam and Eve did not tread in the Garden of Eden.

But why are astrophysics and paleontology not shunned in the same manner as evolution? I fail to understand why the notion of evolution is continually portrayed as cold and mechanical, devoid of any purpose, while the Big Bang is almost universally accepted. Perhaps we are just so overwhelmed by the natural world that many of us cannot conceive of a process that would produce such splendor. Perhaps this is where disbelief transforms into faith.

We have asked many questions about this world, and we have uncovered many answers. Yet we have also asked questions to which there can be no answers: What is the nature of our existence? What happened before time began? What started the event that led to the creation of the universe?

These questions cannot be answered by science; they are untestable. They are part of a personal truth, and they can be answered in any way we choose. Some find these questions to be settled by invoking the notion of God. I, on the other hand, must learn to accept all the questions for which science is silent, and to quote R.M. Rilke, perhaps someday I'll live into the answers.

Next stop: petaflops

This year has seen several super-computing groups reach processing speeds well into the hundreds of billions of calculations per second. So, it is not surprising that the long-sought-after one teraflops milestone has been reached — that is, one trillion floating-point operations per second. The goal was achieved last weekend by a group of scientists running a simulation of metallic magnetism in 1,024 virtual iron atoms on a Cray T3E supercomputer at Cray's laboratory in Minnesota. The computer, boasting 1,480 individual processors working in parallel, actually reached a speed of 1.002 teraflops.

But can they build a bomb out of Drano and a wad of gum?

By retro-fitting an old electron microscope destined for the junkyard, researchers at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire have built a prototype free-electron laser the size of a couple of beer kegs. Conventional free-electron lasers (FELs) are the size of Montreal's Molson Centre (which is, coincidentally, nicknamed The Keg). FELs are used as precision-tuned infrared light sources in such disciplines as atmospheric physics, biochemistry and nanotechnology. The plan now is to produce an even smaller version of the FEL, one that could fit in the palm of the hand.

entities. Like Aristotle, he assumed causality between entities. However, his theory was markedly different from Aristotle's in that he assumed that an entity may be a composite of other entities. The theorem proceeded as: An uncaused cause is self-sufficient. However, a composite exists by virtue of its components rather than by virtue of itself. Therefore, no composite can be self-sufficient. He continued to argue that there could at most be one uncaused cause, for two or more uncaused entities would be composite, having that feature in common. Based on these arguments, Avicenna concluded that there is a unique universal uncaused cause. The major assumptions of his proof are accepted today. The difficulties encountered by Avicenna would have been more easily solved given today's knowledge of set theory, making the argument mathematical, as opposed to cosmological.

Which brings us to Hatcher and his talk here at Queen's. Hatcher has contributed to this process of attempting to find a logical proof of God's existence by building upon Avicenna's model. He 'mathematized' the theorem, making it logically valid by today's standards. Hatcher's universe includes phenomena, or classes or collections of entities, that may not themselves be entities. This altered assumption is more logically valid and allows Hatcher to philosophize about interactions or relations between phenomena as opposed to merely looking at causality between entities. As well, Hatcher's theorem also uses modern set theory to mathematically describe these relations between phenomena and entities. By presenting the arguments in a mathematical manner, Hatcher's proof becomes logically compelling and streamlined as opposed to intuitively valid and cosmological.

In his presentation, Hatcher summarized his theorem which explains, in mathematical language, his updated version of Avicenna's theorem and concluded the existence of a noncomposite unique universal uncaused cause. A compelling aspect of this work is that, for the conclusion of this theorem to be doubted, the basic assumptions of the theorem must be called into question. However, this requires a higher degree of abstraction than accepting these currently believed assertions as rational. In that sense, the logical proof of God's existence demonstrated through this mathematical language requires that believers accept what is held to be rational while, ironically, atheists must use abstract thought and an amount of faith that these assumptions will not hold true. Whether this mathematical theorem will remain unaltered through the course of history remains to be seen.

The search for logic and coherence within one's belief system, however, is an intrinsic aspect of spirituality. Through religious expression humans attempt to examine seemingly miraculous and terrifying aspects of life. The combination of logic and religion is not a paradox since humans possess a need to understand their world, making these two supposedly divergent concepts unified in their application.

Summer in Sudan

Reflections on three months of work for the Samaritan's Purse International Relief Organization

BY GREGORY MOORE

I NEVER ASKED MYSELF WHAT I WAS DOING AS I headed off to Sudan for three months this past summer. I just went.

In January of 1998, after having contacted the Samaritan's Purse International Relief Organization, I discovered that I would be working for them at a small bush hospital in southern Sudan.

For those of you who haven't heard of this organization, Samaritan's Purse was founded in 1970 by the late Bob Pierce. Pierce was a Christian man who strongly believed that as a servant of God he was called to help those in emergency need. He wanted people in North America to help needy individuals overseas through short-term relief projects.

Even with the major import of supplies by the relief organization, the hospital resembled one that might be seen at a summer camp.

Besides a few checkup phone calls to make sure that I still wanted to go and had received all of my necessary vaccinations, I didn't have much communication with the organization that would be taking me halfway across the world.

When I arrived in Sudan at the end of April, the reason became clear as to why Samaritan's Purse had not told me much about where I was headed: nothing they could have said would have prepared me for what I first experienced.

Even before the plane landed, I knew the heat was going to be more intense than any other I had endured. Cruising at about 100 feet over the treetops, the heat radiating from the red earth below heated the plane's interior to more than 30°C. This warmth paled in comparison to the greater than 50°C temperatures commonly found under the southern Sudan sun.

For 15 years, a civil war has waged between the people of southern Sudan and the Government of Sudan (GOS). In May of 1984, after years of forced slavery and oppression, the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army (SPLA) became a known entity when one unprepared commander of the rebel army launched an ill advised attack on a GOS platoon. They had been meeting secretly for several months, but were not planning to attack the GOS until further preparation. Since that unplanned attack, civil war has ruled in southern Sudan and changed the way its people live.

ONE... TWO... THREE... FOUR CEMENT buildings — the only permanence in the small village where I was to live for the next three months. Arriving in the village for the first time, I quickly saw the reality of life for these people: tattered clothes, bodies of skin and bone, scattered homes simply made of mud and grass, deteriorating health, and long lineups for water from a single working well. The needs were evident, and Samaritan's Purse, along with others, had taken on the task of trying to fulfill them.

My first responsibility with the Samaritan's Purse team was to help with the smooth running of a seed project. The objective was to provide the village and surrounding areas with seeds and tools for planting during the upcoming rainy season. Drought and the turmoil of war made previous years' harvests unsuccessful and the people were eager to have another opportunity to supply food for their families.

Food distribution programs such as OXFAM, which is run by the United Nations, sporadically bring rations into southern Sudan, but this often meets the food requirements for only a certain number of weeks; no more food is distributed for months. The expectation of the seed project was that the villagers would take control of their own food production and become more self-sufficient.

The primary focus of Samaritan's Purse was establishing a small hospital that would eventually be run by the Sudanese people. Besides the one expatriate doctor, a surgeon, and a few nurses, the staff was made up of 84 people from the local area. Those with even the most limited education were chosen to help, along with the few who had a comprehensible grasp of the English language.

Drugs, sutures, surgical tools, scissors and other items rarely, if ever, seen before in southern Sudan were now a part of the village hospital. Even with the major import of supplies by the relief organization, the hospital resembled one that might be seen at a summer camp. Still, wounded soldiers, malnourished children, hernia cases and various other patients came from many miles to obtain treatment at the hospital.

I quickly saw the reality of life for these people: tattered clothes, bodies of skin and bone, scattered homes simply made of mud and grass, deteriorating health, and long lineups for water from a single working well.

During the time I spent at the hospital, I had the fortune of meeting Justin Gho, a young 25-year old Ugandan. Justin was considered one of the best nurses, working with the utmost precision, dedication and care. Having a keen interest in athletics like myself, Justin and I soon began jogging (a foreign and peculiar idea to the majority of the villagers!) each morning before work. While jogging (I must add that he was always wearing long pants and long sleeves while doing so), we would strike up conversations about a variety of topics: sports, school, girls, family, religion and life in general.

The similarities between us were astounding. We may have been from polar backgrounds, but a firm bond was forever formed between us. I hope that in my future as a doctor, I can be as dedicated to helping those in need as Justin was to the many patients he treated.

Some of the patients were grateful for the hospital. One man, after having his left leg amputated due to a severe case of osteomyelitis (bacterial infection of the bone), could not stop praising the hospital and the new life it gave to those who were treated.

Other patients, even after being treated, didn't seem to know why they should be thankful for what they had received. Perhaps they felt that they simply deserved treatment. Years of suffering without medical attention may do that to someone. Or perhaps they concluded that the present help was simply another organization providing short-term relief to a seemingly incurable problem. Why be thankful?

WHEN I LEFT SUDAN AT THE END of July, the temperatures were much more bearable as clouds often weakened the daytime light. The greatest experience of my life thus far was coming to a close and I wasn't sure how to feel. I had been changed by the experience forever — by the people I met, the conversations I had and the reality I saw. I was forever leaving behind friends who could never fathom the world I lived in.

And what had I left them? A part of me no doubt, as well as the work I had helped accomplish with Samaritan's Purse. This work of best intentions that sadly seems to do so little long-term good for the people of southern Sudan and their never-ending civil war.

THEN THERE WERE EIGHT...
With the CIAU football season having reached the quarterfinals, the O-QFC final is surprising. It will be the Laval Rouge et Or visiting the Concordia Stingers for the Dunsmore Cup. The three-time conference champion Ottawa Gee-Gees were defeated by the Rouge et Or in their first ever playoff game, while Concordia upended the Bishop's Gaiters. In other quarterfinals, the number two ranked Waterloo Warriors visit the number one ranked Western Mustangs in the OUA final. Defending Vanier Cup champion UBC will be visiting the Saskatchewan Huskies, while it will be the Mount Allison Mounties and Acadia Axemen playing for Atlantic conference honours.

The first-ever OUA women's lacrosse championship banner was awarded last weekend in Oshawa and presented to a victorious Queen's squad. When the banner was revealed to all the participants for the first time at a banquet on Saturday, the Gaels were given the extra incentive needed. On the road to victory, the women pummeled Brock by a score of 14-2, York 14-6 and Toronto 10-7 in the gold medal game. Darcie Spearing scored nine goals in the tournament and was named the OUA Athlete of the Week.

Queen's entered the tournament with a tonne of confidence. During the regular season, the Gaels compiled a 6-0 record and outscored their opponents by a wide margin of 54-13. The top three goal scorers in the Eastern division were all from Queen's. Anne Benedetti had 13 goals and Spearing and Silvana Yee had 10 goals each during the regular season.

On Friday afternoon, the women faced Brock University and were a little concerned because they did not know much about the team since they had not played them all year. All fears were quickly put aside, however, as the Queen's offence roared to life. The tone of this game was best summed up by Spearing, when she said that "we just kept scoring."

In a game that was thoroughly dominated by Queen's, Benedetti scored four goals, Stef Schneider scored three,

Women's soccer one step from national glory

It was a goal at the start of the season, and it's become a reality at the end for the Queen's women's soccer team.

The Gaels will be making an impact on the national scene when they join five other contenders in a race for the CIAU Championship in Victoria this weekend.

After spending much of the year undefeated and ranked number one in Canada, the Gaels earned a trip to Victoria, their first appearance at the nationals in three years, with an OUA semi-final win over the hated University of Ottawa Gee-Gees. Queen's followed up that great performance with a slow start in the championship game against Western and it cost them the OUA crown.

"We had the potential to win it [Western game], but we didn't show up to play in the first 10 minutes when they scored two goals," said veteran defender Nicole Miller. "We had so many chances to score in the second half when we dominated play and the shots just didn't go in." The loss was not crushing for the team as the invitation to nationals was already earned, but it was a disappointment.

"We really wanted the Ontario title, that's for sure," said goaltender Amanda Foran. "[However] it might be a bit of a motivating factor... if there was a game to lose, it was that one."

Cross country teams expect to shine in Waterloo

By ADAM KAMINSKY

The sixth-ranked men's and fifth-ranked women's cross country teams head to the CIAU championships this weekend on the same team bus but with disparate momentum.

With the women coming off an outstanding second place showing at the OUA championships and the men finishing a disappointing fourth, the national championship in Waterloo will tell the final story of this promising campaign.

The 2.5 km loop that the athletes will be running is a challenging one, with numerous hills and tight corners.

"This is a new course, but it is very similar to the one that we ran up at Queen's which was an event both myself and the team won this year, so that bodes well for us," said men's captain Bob McGill. "Both teams have a good chance to medal."

In addition to the favourable course, the good performance of the women at the OUA's also gives confidence to the squad.

"I really think that the women have built all year towards this race and I really like their attitude," said Coach Shane Lakins. With a dominant Western squad, winning the event will be difficult, but they will compete to win a medal.

"We feel that on any given day, anyone can be beat," said Lakins.

For the men, the poor performance two weeks ago may serve as a motivational tool.

"The guys are definitely out for some vindication, our performance at the OUA's did not reflect our ability," said McGill. The team can take solace from the example set two years ago when the team finished fifth in the OUA's before bouncing back and winning the silver at the nationals.

With the front running Windsor Lancers and traditional powerhouses University of Victoria, Alberta and Dalhousie all looking strong, the quest to medal will be trying, but McGill feels that last week was an aberration.

"Every race has been a good one this season and one stinker in the pot I can put up with, but two I can't," he said. "This weekend is a good chance for us to show that we deserve to be with the 'big boys'."

Queen's splits weekend

BY NAETE SAGER

The Queen's men's hockey team experienced a roller coaster ride last weekend. On Saturday afternoon, the Gaels shot out the lights, trouncing the Ryerson Rams 10-3. The following day against the Brock Badgers, a third period defensive letdown contributed greatly to a 5-3 loss, costing the Gaels a chance to extend their lead in the OUA Midwest division.

Queen's 10 Ryerson 3
Brock 5 Queen's 3

"We'd love to have had the sweep," commented Queen's Head Coach Chris MacDonald. "We're happy with the way the team is performing. We've been able to generate [scoring] chances... but we have to finish them."

On Saturday afternoon, the outcome was never seriously in doubt, as left winger Matt Thorne tallied twice in the first period, as the Gaels opened a 7-1 lead after 30 minutes. The forward trio of Jason Flynn, D'Arcy O'Shea and OUA scoring leader Rob Mailloux was simply devastating, combining for 11 points. Flynn enjoyed a field day pinch-hitting for the injured Jonathan Bishop as the tricolour's first-line centre. He fired home three goals and contributed a pair of assists, while O'Shea scored twice and Mailloux drew three helpers. Not to be outdone, Jeff Scobie had his second consecutive three-point outing, with a goal and two assists, while his linemate, Paul Lang, picked up three assists. Rounding out the scoring were a pair of blueliners, tender Jason Skilnick was tested less often, but rose to the challenge posed by his Brock counterpart. This was particularly evident on an acrobatic pad save midway through the second period.

In the final minute of the second period, Brock's Peter Lough solved Skilnick, sending Dave Wilson and captain Scott Richardson.

On Sunday versus Brock, the Gaels again drew first blood, as Alec St. Louis tallied on a first-period power play. Throughout the first two periods, the Gaels pelted Badger netminder Mark Lachance with shots, but came up empty time and time again. At the other end, Gaels' goal-teams into the intermission deadlocked at one. When the teams reconvened for the decisive period, the Gaels immediately asserted themselves, as Mailloux converted O'Shea's centering feed from behind the net just 23 seconds after the face-off. Undaunted, Brock fought back to tie, and at the seven-minute mark, took their first lead when left winger Joe Forte flipped a rebound over a prone Skilnick for his second goal of the game.

"We've been able to generate [scoring] chances... but we have to finish them."

— Head Coach
Chris MacDonald

The Gaels then knotted the affair at three, as Flynn put away his own rebound with nine minutes left in regulation time, sowing the seeds for a dramatic conclusion. With 5:24 showing on the clock, a give-away inside the Gaels' blue line presented Brock with a golden opportunity, and Lough blasted a howitzer past Skilnick for the eventual winning goal. In the final minutes, the Gaels besieged the Brock end for the equalizer, as a Mailloux drive with 1:45 left nicked the crossbar, but the Badgers weathered the storm, and iced the win with an empty-net marker.

"Give Brock full credit," commented MacDonald. "When they had a chance, they scored."

The Gaels will be put to the test severely this weekend, when they travel to La Belle Province to face two formidable foes, Concordia and Trois-Rivières.

Landon top rookie

BY JOURNAL SPORTS STAFF

The O-QIFC conference awards have been handed out and Queen's rookie offensive tackle Jon Landon has earned the Peter Gorman Trophy as conference Rookie of the Year.

The Kingston native came highly recruited out of Holy Cross High School and was able to start from week one at the challenging left tackle position. While not the biggest lineman on the team, he used his great footwork, athleticism and determination to excel, as his tools to dominate at the university game.

Head Coach Bob Howes described Landon as the best young offensive lineman that he has ever coached.

By winning the award, Landon will be the O-QIFC representative at the CIAU all-Canadian dinner in Toronto during Vanter Cup week at the end of November. As the conference's top rookie, he will be competing with the rookies of the year from the three other conferences to earn national recognition.

The conference's Outstanding Player award went to Ottawa's superstar quarterback Phil Coté.

In the game Victoria bound

A week in the life of Queen's athletics

Women's hockey

This past weekend, the women's hockey team took a big step forward in their hopes for qualifying for the post season after capturing three of a possible four points against rival York. In Friday's game, the Gaels led 1-0 on a goal by Kathryn White until the game was tied with 21 seconds left. In helping her team to a 1-1 tie, goalie Claudia Tom stood on her head the entire game and repeatedly made breathtaking saves. On Saturday afternoon, the Gaels rebounded by defeating York 3-2 for their first victory of the year. Sarah Reid and Lori Loftus brought a steady physical presence to the ice, as well as scoring punch. Scoring the third goal of the game was Kim Bjotkland.

Saturday, the Gaels poor shooting percentage (31 per cent) continued, and the team lost to Carleton 85-72. Richardson and Purdy were once again the lone bright spots, contributing 20 and 11 points respectively. The team opens their regular season this weekend against York and University of Toronto.

weekend against York and University of Toronto.

Women's water polo

In Saturday's action in a cross-over meet at the Physical Education Centre, the women's troubles continued after back-to-back losses to Ottawa and Carleton. Ottawa pummeled the Gaels 12-3 but Carleton faced a more difficult challenge, squeaking by 13-11.

Women's volleyball

On Friday night, the women's volleyball team climbed to the .500 mark with a strong showing against York University. The Gaels improved their record to 1-1 with an aggressive 3-1 victory (15-10, 15-3, 12-15, 15-11).

Men's basketball

In men's basketball action, the Gaels split their weekend matches against RMC and Carleton. Queen's dominated RMC on Friday by a count of 84-56, despite shooting only 46 per cent from the field. Helping their cause was Derek Richardson who scored 20 points and added eight rebounds. John Putdy contributed 13 points and hustled for 14 rebounds. On

Women's basketball

This past weekend, Queen's hosted the women's basketball Tindall tournament and it resulted in the Gaels splitting their two games. On Friday, the women lost a close battle to Laval 80-76 but rebounded in fine fashion on Saturday with a convincing 62-36 victory over Windsor. The squad will also open their regular season this

With a two-week break between the OUA final and their CIAU opener against the Calgary Dinosaurs, the team was able to rest up and take care of some of their injuries.

"Everyone was really hurting after the OUs, we had a rough three game weekend and people were both physically and emotionally drained," explained Miller. "It was good we had this time to nurse some of those injuries."

When the well-rested Gaels arrive in Victoria they are going to have to deal with an interesting championship format. With six teams at the tournament divided into two pools, a round robin format exists with goal differential being all important. Queen's will be joined by the Dinosaurs and the Dalhousie Tigers in their pool while the OUA champion Mustangs, the McGill Martlets and the host University of Victoria Vikings will be on the other side of the draw. The winner of each pool plays in the final on Sunday afternoon.

"We learnt last time [1995 CIAU Championship] that every goal scored is crucial because it's round-robin and goal differential is very important to see who goes through," said all-conference mid-fielder Judith Trepanier.

The Gaels' pool sets up well. Their first opponent, the Dinosaurs, come into the tournament as a surprise entrant after finishing fourth in the regular season in Western conference play and then defeating the powerful defending champion Alberta Pandas in the first round of the playoffs. Much like Queen's, Calgary followed up their big semi-final win with a loss in the conference finals, losing to Victoria. The third member of the pool, the Atlantic Conference champion Tigers, are a perennial contender who feature a number of talented individual stars.

"These are good match-ups," said OUA East coach of the Year McDowell. "[The women] are excited about their opponents, they are good teams but we are confident."

Before even leaving for Victoria the team has won one battle as they were able to raise enough money so that every member of the team could make the trip.

"We had a lot of support, a lot of varsity teams have been fantastic, the rugby and football teams have given us money, it's been overwhelming," gushed Foran. "It is fantastic to be able to send our entire team and our entire coaching staff because everybody has put so much effort in it and it wouldn't have been fair."

The team is hoping that the full contingent will mean more people for the celebration on Sunday afternoon.

You'd better take your vitamins

BY JULIETA LOEFFLER

To function properly and maintain good health, your body has certain needs that must be met. No single factor seems to play a bigger role in sports performance than a person's diet. There isn't any single "magic diet" that will produce a winning performance at your next sporting activity or make you feel like a million dollars overnight. There are many products on the market today that claim to increase performance, energy or decrease weight quickly. Consumers must look carefully at these products as they can be misrepresented and misinterpreted.

In short, people have a few basic necessities to keep their bodies running efficiently. Food is used to give your muscles and body tissues fuel, it helps regulate the process of the body, and it supplies body heat. There are six categories in which to divide food, all six are necessary to maintain a healthy body. They are water, minerals, vitamins, proteins, fats and carbohydrates.

The most important food for the body is water. It is not usually thought of as a food because it does not have any caloric value, but it is essential in maintaining life. Our body is 60 per cent water and therefore humans can only last a matter of a few days without it; a 15 per cent to 20 per cent loss of water can be fatal. This is because it is used in various functions, such as digestion, absorption and transportation of nutrients, circulation, excretion, and maintaining electrolyte balance in the body. Since water is used to maintain a normal body temperature, large volumes of it are lost via sweating. It is extremely important to replenish your water before, during and after exercise. An average of two litres a day are recommended.

Minerals are simple inorganic elements. There are 17 essential minerals in a person's diet, including: calcium, phosphorus, magnesium, sodium, chloride, potassium and fluoride. Most of these can be found in fruits, vegetables and legumes. A lot of them are also found in milk products and eggs.

Vitamins are a group of organic compounds that perform specific functions in promoting growth and maintaining good health. They function as catalysts in chemical reactions throughout the body. They are essential in the building of tissues, for the control of food in our body, and for the release of energy.

Vitamin A, B1 and niacin are three vitamins of particular interest, as they play a primary role in exercise and health. Vitamin A is necessary for night vision, it contributes to healthy skin, prevention of infections, normal bone development and tooth formation. This vitamin can be found in liver, kidney, milk, butter, egg yolk, yellow vegetables, apricots, cantaloupe and peaches. Vitamins B1 and niacin are necessary for energy metabolism. They are both found in organ meats, grains, eggs and legumes.

Proteins are nitrogen-containing compounds comprised of amino acids. They are necessary in the structure of enzymes, cells, antibodies and many hormones. They also are necessary for growth (especially in muscle growth), and the maintenance and repair of body tissues. While the body can manufacture many amino acids, some can't be manufactured and must therefore be ingested through diet. Meats, fish, and poultry contain all the essential amino acids in sufficient quantity and in proper ratios. Vegetables and grains contain amino acids but not in proper ratios and therefore should be properly balanced if one is a vegetarian.

Fats or lipids are generally thought of negatively but fat is necessary and it has many useful functions in the body. It is an essential component of cell walls and nerve fibres and it is a primary source of energy. It also supports and cushions vital organs, is used in the absorption of fat-soluble vitamins, and is an insulating layer, which helps retain body heat.

Carbohydrates are composed of simple sugars and starches. The body breaks down both of these into glucose, which is used by the body for various functions. Glucose is the main source of energy for the body and the sole source of energy for the nervous system. All six components of food are necessary for maintaining a healthy and active body. All six play vital roles and must be consumed in sufficient quantities. Your body is an amazing tool and must be attended to. You are the only person who controls what you feed it. Use your body to its maximum potential by giving it the foods that are essential for its survival.

ATHLETES OF THE WEEK Lacrosse legends

This past weekend in Oshawa, the women's lacrosse team captured the first OUA championship ever awarded with the help of star players Anne Benedetti and Darcie Spearing. For their superior effort, these women have been named the Queen's Journal Athletes of the Week.

At an awards banquet for the lacrosse players on Saturday, Benedetti should have brought along a wheelbarrow to trek home all the hardware she collected. She was named the league's top scorer (13 goals), a conference all-star, the Most Valuable Player and Shared Coach of the Year honours with Spearing and Nancy Symons.

Born in Cambridge, Ontario, the fourth-year Con-Ed student has only been playing lacrosse since her second year at Queen's. This past summer she played for the Ontario provincial team and "really fell in love with the game."

The team travelled throughout North America, making stops in Virginia, Colorado and Baltimore and the experience helped make Benedetti a more complete player. "I learned the skills of the game (this summer, and improved) my stickwork and (learned) not to just blow by everyone," said Benedetti.

If she continues to improve her game, Benedetti hopes to eventually try out for Canada's entry into the World Cup of Lacrosse.

that strong. This past summer, however, she returned home to play and coach the Regina team. She helped coach players from grades 9-12 and focused on teaching team skills. Spearing's squad was good enough to win the provincial championship and the experience helped to improve her coaching abilities. Spearing said she has enjoyed her dual role as player-coach this year and has enjoyed working with both Benedetti and Symons. The main challenge of her coaching position has been to separate the task of coaching from her close friendships with the players. "It's tough making choices on who plays, sometimes we have to separate ourselves from personal relationships (and) find who deserves to play."

Symons describes her two co-workers in glowing terms. "They are two of the most amazing people I've ever met. It's not their play on the field that makes them amazing athletes, it's their overall personalities."

And now these athletes have an OUA championship banner to go alongside their amazing personalities.

shots all over the place," said Spearing. Benedetti continued the accolades when she described Phibbs as "a great passer in the crease (who is) really confident when she has the ball."

Once Brock was dumped aside, the Gaels focused their aggression on arch rival York University. In each of the last two seasons, the Yeowomen had defeated Queen's in the final, but this time the Gaels were ready. York came out aggressively and "really turned it on," according to Symons. Benedetti described Spearing's play as "amazing and she made beautiful shots (which resulted) in inspiring goals." — four of them to be exact. Meredith Gilbert exploded in this game as well, adding four goals of her own. At 5'11", Gilbert is tall enough that she is able to score a lot of wraparound Wayne Gretzky-like goals. Spearing described her as "a really good offensive player that can reach overtop of the goalie." Also adding goals in the 14-6 thrashing was Benedetti with a hat trick, Yee with two goals and Schneider with a single.

During the regular season, the Gaels compiled a 6-0 record and outscored their opponents by a wide margin of 54-13.

After depositing their first and second-round opponents by a combined score of 28-8, the final battle against Toronto was all that stood in the way of the Gaels' quest for a championship. Symons said the final was an "intense game from start to finish, with both teams putting in a 120 per cent effort." The Gaels jumped ahead with several quick goals and led at the half by a count of 8-3. In the second half, Toronto turned it on and pulled within two goals at 9-7. With three minutes left however, Spearing clinched it with the final goal of the game. As time ran out on their opponents "everyone went nuts... because it was the championship and (it) was the most intense game of the year," said Symons.

The Golden Gaels have set a high standard in varsity lacrosse by winning the very first OUA championship after cruising through the regular season and playoffs undefeated. With a strong returning core of veterans, the foundation has been laid for a dynasty.

INTERVIEW

Race car driver Greg Moore, a 23-year old who has enjoyed substantial success on the Indy Car series, came to Queen's in the midst of his Ontario campus tour on Tuesday, to speak to students about Molson's Take Care initiative. It is a program that promotes responsible drinking and discourages drinking and driving.

Queen's Journal — How did you get involved with Molson's Take Care program?

Greg Moore — I started with them in 1995 when I was still in Indy Lights (equivalent to AAA for Indy Car), after a friend of mine was killed drinking and driving while another was injured in the same crash. I really hit home and when I was old enough to work with Molson, I approached them and it was kind of like a back and forth thing. It took a while but I guess they felt that having a 19-year old speaking about drinking and driving and a guy who is in the public eye would probably be a good idea. Also being a professional race car driver and probably having more skills on the road than most people... hopefully... if I am not doing it [drinking and driving] and other race car drivers aren't doing it, then it is probably not a good idea to be doing it.

QJ — Getting to your racing season, you started off fast, but you sort of slowed down by the end. What was your feeling about this past year?

GM — This year I am the happiest I have been with my driving, the results were not as good as I would have wanted, but I learnt a lot in this series and I applied a lot more this season. I won my first 500 mile race and that was nice. Winning this race was nice because it takes a lot more patience to win this type of race... We learnt a lot more this year and I think next year it's the championship for sure.

QJ — The Cart series has become more international in both locations and racers, how do you feel about the growth?

GM — I think it is good the way it is growing internationally, obviously it is going to be great for TV. On the other hand, what I think the series is doing is concentrating too much on the overseas things and not enough in North America. We have a competitor (Indy Racing League) now that we have to try and have better TV ratings than, better races than and have more fans. If we start to lose the fans in North America to that circuit, we are in trouble.

QJ — With the departure of overall Cart champion Alex Zanardi to Formula 1 racing and the success of fellow Canadian Jacques Villeneuve on that series, is that something you would consider doing?

GM — I am not thinking about it, I mean I'm sure I would have to consider it, but it wasn't my dream. My dream was always, watching the Indy 500, watching guys like Al [Unser Jr.], Michael [Andretti], Rick Mears and Mario Andretti and saying that is what I want to do. We had our first Indy Car race in Vancouver in 1990 and as soon as I saw it, I knew that's what I wanted to be. I want to be successful here before I do anything else. If I am 25 or 26 years old and I have won this [Cart] championship and have been very successful here, I will look at other things. I don't want to become stale, and win a championship or a couple of championships and then just say well, I want to go for my fifth and sixth championship.

QJ — Having started on the Cart series at a young age (20), what was it like to drive against guys like Al Jr. and Michael who you watched while growing up?

GM — At first it was pretty overwhelming. We went to Miami for what is called spring training and I'm on the race track and I'm driving around and a car passes me and it's [racing legend] Emerson Fittipaldi. I thought, "That was Emmo, wow." I got up to speed and started to catch him and eventually passed him and I thought, "Wow, I just passed Emmo." That's when it really hit me, that this was what I was doing and it was like there's Michael, let's catch him and try and pass him.

QJ — A great story in Canadian sports in the past few years has been the rise of a number of prominent Canadian race car drivers, be it at the FI level like Villeneuve or in Indy Car with Scott Goodyear a few years back, yourself, Paul Tracy and Patrick Carpentier. Is the sky the limit for Canadian drivers?

GM — I think that it helps a lot, now you can go to the Molson Indy in Toronto and you have myself or Paul or Patrick to look at and say I want to be like them. If you look at Jacques, myself and Patrick, we are all products of the Players [cigarette company] development program. With the new tobacco bills coming out, it's going to be tough. I don't see a lot of companies willing to spend that amount of money that Players is. I am a little bit worried about it, but on the other hand you still have the role models to shoot for and that makes it a little bit easier.

QJ — It is a common misconception that race car drivers are not athletes. How would you respond to that?

GM — Until you have sat in a race car and tried to do it, you don't understand what it is like. At the Molson Indy in Toronto, my average heart rate was around 160-180 beats a minute for two hours. A lot of it might not be physical exercise, although we need strong arms and strong legs, but the thing about it is there is so much stress going, so your mind is extremely taxed because at 200mph you're covering a football field every second. Your mind is forced to take in a lot of information and process it. If you get tired, you make mistakes because you're not fit enough and you will see people start to fall off the pace.

QJ — It must be a little boring to drive regular cars?

GM — I used to have a Dodge Viper and I would get in and feel that it was exceptionally fast and people would laugh when I would say that. It is simply that I am able to separate race car driving and regular driving into completely different areas. It is never that different to drive on the city streets.

Suppose that we have a round robin competition involving n players. Each pair of players competes in some games, the other as the loser (for simplicity, we assume that there are no tie games). How might we rank the participants in this kind of competition? There are a number of ranking schemes which have been proposed, and in this talk we focus on a method due to Kendall and Wei. In the course of our discussion, we will find that while the Kendall-Wei method may not be entirely satisfactory, it does lead to some interesting mathematical problems.

Die Laughing The Imaginary Invalid hits funnybone

Getting Physical: Perry Mucci and Graeme Stewart get personal.

Angelique has other plans, however, because her heart belongs to another man, Cleante, played by Dorian Foley. It is this tense situation which produces a number of laughs in the production.

More laughter is injected into the play by the scheming servant Toinette, played by Paula Schultz, and the conniving step-mother Beline, played by Erica Garrington.

Epstein provoked laughter from all audience members with his characterization of a slow, almost disabled, man.

PLAY REVIEW

Imaginary Invalid
 Rotunda Theatre

By SARAH CROSBIE

The life of any man who receives 20 doses of medicine and twenty enemas in one month must be painful, but no one can understand the discomfort that Argan, one of the main characters in Moliere's comedy, The Imaginary Invalid endures. Translated and directed by Maurice Breslow, The Imaginary Invalid is the Queen's drama department's major fall production. The comic storyline revolves around Argan, played by Perry Mucci, a hypochondriac who believes he is alive only because numerous enemies have kept his system flushed out. Ironically, it is also the refusal of an enema which dissolves his idea of a marriage.

The Imaginary Invalid, currently playing at the Rotunda Theatre, utilizes simplistic set and lighting designs, but this is not to say that they were ineffective. All action in the play takes place in Argan's bedroom, which consists of only a large poster bed, Argan's red velvet sick chair, a large wardrobe and a few other chairs, set against a yellow and blue striped background. The colours and sparsity of the set allow the script and the acting to be the focus of the play — enhancing the production.

OASIS
The Masterplan
 Epic Records

By JIM WHITTINGTON

I guess Oasis decided to release The Masterplan as a mid-album snack for their fans before they release their new material some time in the next year or two... and what's the masterplan you ask? Well it seems like this release is a ploy to make a shit load of cash from some subpar Oasis B-sides.

the key of A, but they write some catchy tunes that, like it or not, are going to be classics.

The Masterplan is a collection of songs that were released with Oasis's major singles over the past four years in the UK. None of them can be heard on any of the three major releases so there's a lot of unknown tracks here. If you're one of those obsessed fans you'll probably like the album, but if you want to hear tonnes of good music, don't pay for this masterplan.

Most of the CD seems like filler for the few good songs on the album. The long list of lowlights include: "Underneath the Sky," which is poorly arranged, with a really irritating guitar/piano line; "Swamp Song," which features Paul Weller, is a boring instrumental that, like "Going Nowhere," goes nowhere; and finally, there's "Headshrinker," which, although I can't put my finger on it, has got to be a rip off of some classic seventies rock song.

There are a few roses growing out of this pile of crap. "Acquiesce" is pretty good, and seems like an energetic song to hear live. "Talk Tonight" is a nice acoustic number, but I'd like it a lot better if Noel ditched the starting lyric: "Sittin' on my own, chewin' on a bone." It's just stupid, even for him. Finally, the title track and "Rockin' Chair" aren't too shabby. Both have some nice musical changes throughout to keep them interesting.

There are a few roses growing out of this pile of crap. "Acquiesce" is pretty good, and seems like an energetic song to hear live.

I don't think Oasis has done much better than their first album Definitely Maybe thus far, and this new release sure didn't change my mind. The Masterplan is nothing but a novelty item for superfans. So, unless you've just gotta own every Oasis tune, don't buy this album, because it's not worth it.

Sliding into Kingston Maestro raps a fresh beat

INTERVIEW

By STEFAN MURRAY

Canada's ambassador of rap will be "Conductin' T'bangs" in Kingston tonight with a new arsenal of music and a shortened moniker. The Maestro, who dropped the Fresh-Wes from his title, will play Alfie's this evening to support his current album Built to Last.

The new recording, his first in five years, is a corner-turner for Maestro — many critics will be wondering whether his new material can compete with his multi-platinum, Juno-winning releases of the late eighties and early nineties. However, in an interview with The Journal, Maestro made it clear that he is not about to let his reputation as the composer of radio-friendly hits like "Let your Backbone Slide" and "Drop the Needle" define him as a performer.

"Everytime I touch a mic or go into a recording booth, I got something to prove," said Maestro. "Once I'm on stage I block all my shit out, when I record it's like I'm in my own world."

Although he's excited about his latest release, die-hard Maestro fans can still count on hearing a few old favourites on Friday night, specifically titles from 1990s phenomenally successful album Symphony In Effect.

"My first album was pretty tight and ahead of its time," Maestro recalled. "It's still dope lyrically, I feel."

Maestro has been touring lately to promote Built to Last and to provide his fans with the excitement they have come to expect. Judging from his last couple of University shows, Queen's students should be in for a slamin' time.

"Once I'm on stage I block all my shit out, when I record it's like I'm in my own world."

— Maestro

"I did a show at Western. It was off the hook. In Barrie [at Georgian College] the fire marshal had to be called in. It was crazy. Crazy, crazy shows," the performer explained.

As for his future as Canada's greatest hip-hop export, Maestro was reluctant to discuss his plans.

"Whatever, it's all good, everything in its time," said Maestro. "Right now I'm just trying to blow this shit out of the water."

The Friday show will continue a growing trend of hip-hop music at Queen's, building on the success of the Rascalz show in October. According to Maestro, hip-hop has a real future in Canada.

"Hip-hop is not a fad, it is a growing genre," he said.

The Maestro will try to stay true to his words on Friday, proving that like his music, the Canadian rap industry was Built to Last.

Mosaic Concert features Queen's best

CONCERT REVIEW

By KATHY KO

An eclectic array of music which showcases pieces composed by Queen's students and faculty members will be performed Tuesday night for the first concert of the Mosaic Concert Series of the 1998-99 year.

The concert series, which remains unknown to most students, dates back to 1980 when it was originally called The New Concert Series. While the format of the concert has varied over the years, the central focus remains the same — the musical venue allows composers to hear their own work as if they were a member of the audience.

The Mosaic format provides composers in the Queen's community an invaluable outlet for their compositions. Originally, the concert followed a workshop, allowing the audience to interact with the composers. It has now become more of a formalized concert with less emphasis on the question-answer period. Furthermore, music composition students are required to have at least one work performed per term, and the Mosaic Concert Series is an ideal forum.

What most people do not realize is that the Mosaic program offers a wide variety of music.

The composers featured in Tuesday night's program agree that, for them, music composition is an ongoing process that spans over several months. They found the most arduous aspect of the entire process is actually formatting the music for the computer. This process can take about a week depending on the length of the piece. Most of the works performed at Mosaic concerts have been written for a class, but that does not mean all the pieces are "classical" or uniform in sound. What most people do not realize is that the Mosaic program offers a wide variety of music ranging from the experimental — including electroacoustics and twelve tonal work — to the traditional, such as Baroque and Romantic inspired pieces. The Mosaic programs also involves students whose primary study focus is not music. Fourth year economics student Peter Altman is a rock musician who is part of this year's Musical Mosaic. He explains that writing for this concert was his first attempt at classical music which required much more discipline and structure.

The School of Music at Queen's University is one of the few places in Kingston where you can experience the unveiling of new and original music. We, as the audience, have the privilege of witnessing the birth of talented, young composers, but not many people take advantage of it.

For those who are strapped for cash and are looking for an alternative sound, the Musical Mosaic offers free admission for Tuesday night's concert. The concert takes place in room 120 of Harrison-LeCaine Hall.

If you cannot make it to next week's performance, there will be three more concerts in the Mosaic Series in the new year. Shows are scheduled for February 16, March 16, and April 13. For anyone interested in submitting their work for one of the Mosaic concerts, please contact Chris Zarembo at 3c27.

duction, rather than distracting from it.

The lighting and sound effects also stuck to the adage, "a little goes a long way." Both effects were used sparingly and were on cue for the entire production. At times in the play, curtains are opened and closed to lighten or darken the bedroom and at all times the lighting was on cue to properly illuminate the room.

The subtle use of quirky cello, trombone and piano music opened the play and set the mood for the remainder of the evening.

The highlight of The Imaginary Invalid is the acting itself. All of the performances in the first act, given by twelve different actors, were extremely strong. There were no instances of a loss of characterization or forgotten lines.

The acting in The Imaginary Invalid unquestionably allows Moliere's comedic moments to shine.

The most notable performances of the evening were those of Perry Mucci, who made Argan a lovable, yet rude fool, Paula Schulz who brilliantly played the servant Toinette, making the audience question who really had control in Argan's family, Erica Garrington who played Beline and was the epitome of a cunning step-mother and, lastly, Lenny Epstein's portrayal of Thomas Diafoirus, the doctor who Argan wants to marry his daughter. Epstein provoked laughter from all audience members with his characterization of a slow, almost disabled man who shows no sign of thought process, personality or emotion, but rather has memorized all he needs to know from being at university. Toinette emphasizes Diafoirus' stupidity with her line, "Long live the universities that turn out such minds."

The colours and sparsity of the set allow the script and the acting to be the focus of the play.

The acting in The Imaginary Invalid unquestionably allows Moliere's comedic moments to shine. There are numerous funny scenes, but one touching scene which deserves credit occurs between Angelique, (Mackenzie) and Cleante, (Foley), who create a romantic, yet silly, opera together.

The only flaw of the evening occurred near the end of the production, when seventeen other characters joined the stage to create a Greek chorus of sorts. Although the scene was light-hearted and enjoyable, a musical interlude complete with actions, a few cues were missed by members of the chorus and not all actors were in character throughout the episode. Stronger stage presence and vocals were required by some of the actors in the second act to make it as successful as the first.

The Imaginary Invalid is a success for the Queen's drama department and all those involved with the production. It will be playing at the Rotunda Theatre in Theological Hall tonight, Nov. 14-15 and Nov. 18-21. Tickets are $10 for non-students and $8 for students and seniors.

When else will you ever be able to pay so little to see a Greek chorus and ensemble together in one evening?

Waterboy finds oasis

Sandler's new flick a hit

MOVIE REVIEW

By JEFF CHILD

Adam Sandler is back. With his explosively crude brand of humor intact, Sandler is ready to take box offices by storm once again in the new film, The Waterboy.

I know what you're thinking, a movie with a lack of intelligent dialogue and a plot that is an uninspiring, recycled mess is going to bomb. But just add Adam Sandler to this catastrophe and watch the masses flock.

The film revolves around socially inept Bobby Boucher (Sandler), a Louisiana mama's boy from the heart of the southern Bayou. While Bobby may be dim-witted, he does manage to provide purified water for a rag-tag college football team, as a (you guessed it!) waterboy.

However, the team relentlessly teases Bobby about his social shortcomings, until coach Klein (Henry Winkler, who played American folk hero, Arthur "Fonzie" Fonze) teaches him how to unleash the years of torment he has endured as a waterboy, and use his aggression for good.

So, Bobby becomes an overly aggressive, uneducated U.S. college football player. Yeehaa! So far this sounds like a biography of the entire NCAA athletic alumni. As Bobby Boucher learns to channel his anger to aggression, he becomes a dream player, destroying any player who brings the pigskin in his direction.

But how far can one man take a team? Apparently pretty far. Bobby pulls the battered image of his team out of the gutter, ending their forty game losing streak and single-handedly creates a berth in the big game.

OK, so it's not a motion picture masterpiece. There will be no Oscar or Golden Globe nomination. Is The Waterboy worth seeing? Sure it is! While the script is void of any quick-witted or well thought-out jokes, the vulgarity of Sandler's humor forces big laughs. I shook my head in disgusted approval many times throughout the 90 minute flick. There's something about Sandler's obscenely ridiculous half Cajun, half moron dialect that forces you to snicker.

Or maybe it's the fact that you get to cheer on a lanky, uncoordinated, powerhouse of a football player to victory. Despite the seemingly simple script, Sander manages to ingeniously invigorate a film that allows both the simple-minded and noble cinemagoer to enjoy themselves.

While no one is disputing that Adam Sandler is the big draw of the film, The Waterboy is held together by a relatively strong supporting cast. Surprisingly, Sandler plays well off his straight person, Kathy Bates (Mama Boucher) who subtly sets up one joke after another. From serving baby alligators at dinner parties to her outrageous portrayal of an over protective mother, Academy Award winner Bates proves that she too can generate laughs in style. And let's not leave out Winkler, who plays an ailing coach on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Winkler has an impressive ability to subtly sling jokes, off which Sandler relentlessly feeds.

The plot is formulaic and the humor is relatively inane but Sandler, like no other, has the ability to turn the idea of a simple football game into a comedy circus.

It is no surprise that The Waterboy does not have any higher meaning to communicate. The plot is formulaic and the humor is relatively inane but Sandler, like no other, has the ability to turn the idea of a simple football game into a comedy circus.

Although it may sound like a movie geared toward the male audience, during the film when I looked over to see my girlfriend cheering on Bobby Boucher and the Louisiana Mud Dogs to victory, I realized that this movie could be enjoyed by a diverse audience. On that note, if you'd like to drift off into La La land for a while, check out Adam Sandler in The Water Boy.

Theatre 5 production wins big

PLAY REVIEW

Of Mice and Men
Theatre 5

By KEVIN MCCARTHY

Having read John Steinbeck's short novel, Of Mice and Men, I knew what an exceptional book it was. What I didn't realize was how much the story could be enhanced through its adaptation to live theatre. The excellent rendition of Steinbeck's classic work currently running at Theatre 5 gave me a new respect for both the power of theatre and the novel itself. The production is a tremendous success combining excellent acting with timeless writing.

Despite competition from the many Hollywood and Broadway productions of the story, this performance exceeds expectations. In fact one could not imagine another adaptation better capturing the essence of Steinbeck's novel.

Of Mice and Men is the story of George Milton and Lennie Small, two friends trying to make a living as farm labourers during the Depression. They move from job to job sustained by the thought that one day they might get land of their own. However, this optimism is constantly imperilled by Lennie, who possess the strength of a giant but the mind of a child. Tragedy ensues just when it seems their hopes will be finally fulfilled.

Particularly impressive was Clayton Garrett as Lennie, the play's most pivotal and demanding role.

The play takes place on a ranch, with the scenes shifting between the worker's bunkhouse and the barn. A tremendous amount of work clearly went into Theatre 5's set design. A real sense of a farm is created with a minimum of props. The few props used effectively enhanced the dialogue by giving a sense of reality to the conversations. Of particular note was Slim's impressive cat trick. Theatre 5's intimate atmosphere also added to the play's effect. The proximity of the actors was of tremendous importance in the most dramatic scenes.

While sound effects were used effectively, the introduction of music at crit-

The Hunger
Cinematic Superthug
Universal Records

BY MIKE BURGESS

What do you get when you take a monotonous, unoriginal sound and reproduce it in thirteen marginally different ways?

Cinematic Superthug, the newest release by The Hunger?

The album, which can be summarized as "techno-grunge", includes thirteen tracks which are highly repetitive in structure and tone and demonstrate very little contrast in sound or style. The Hunger fails to take their style of music in new directions and does not add anything different to the existing techno-grunge genre. In short, there is nothing new or interesting about Cinematic Superthug.

This is not to say that every track on the album is a part of a compilation of garbage - there are some instances of good music with some variation. One of the better tracks is "Moderation," which attempts a slow, funky groove. Also worth noting are "Phoenix" and "Hey God," which are relatively melodic, and incorporate sophisticated chord progressions. On "One Constant," the most memorable track, The Hunger's limited song-writing abilities and their mix of rock, grunge and guitar effects finally come together to produce a decent song. However, "One Constant" is by no means an exceptional song, and cannot support The Hunger's otherwise sub-par effort.

Over half the songs such as "Free," "Cinematic Superthug," "Ray," "Whore," and "Anarchy" virtually rely on the same hard, repetitive, guitar-driven sound. On other tracks, The Hunger exhibit hints of creativity, but fail to realize the full potential of these songs. For example, several of the songs have good introductions which give way to forgettable choruses.

In the end, Cinematic Superthug leaves the listener's appetite for good music unsatisfied.

Sabrina: The Teenage Witch Soundtrack
Geffen Records

BY SARAH CROSBIE

There's something I need to confess before you even begin to read this: I am in love with pop music. It's an addiction that I've had since the days of roller skating rinks, jelly bracelets and leg warmers - the eighties.

I realize that one of the problems with pop music is that it produces a lot of one-hit-wonders. Does anyone really remember Martika, Bananarama or The Calendar Girls? The music industry compensates for this problem by producing a ridiculous number of pop music CD compilations - and a new one has just hit the street, Sabrina The Teenage Witch, The Album.

For those of you who can't possibly see any reason to buy this CD there are three small words that may have some of you running to your nearest music store - The Spice Girls. The first song on the album is "Walk of Life" by the original five Brits. Ginger included. This new song, previously unreleased in North America, is sultry, slow and the most groovable since "Spice Up Your Life." Yummy, yummy, yummy.

Other worthwhile songs are Matthew Sweet's, "Magnet & Steel," a slow and melodic cover of Walter Egan's 1978 hit, and pop newcomer Britney Spears', "Soda Pop." Her single is a pop lover's dream (in that you can sing and dance to it.) "Soda Pop" is introduced with reggae music which is subsequently interspersed throughout the rest of the song. Watch for this girl - she's sparkly and bubblegum fun.

The only real time the fun on this CD ends is on track number four with "One Way or Another" performed by the witch herself, Melissa Joan Hart. Hart should have left this one to Blondie. Luckily Hart's less than one octave range is covered up by guitar solos and back-up vocals from her show's co-workers.

With other featured pop sensations such as Sugar Ray, Backstreet Boys, Robyn and Aqua, accompanied by songs from upcoming artists such as Pure Sugar, Phantom Planet and The Murmurs, this CD is a worthwhile buy - if you can forget about its silly name and remember the music.

If nothing else, can you really resist a new Spice Girls song?

Night Out") - the last of which sounds a lot like Right Said Fred's "I'm Too Sexy" - aren't that bad, and "Shag Tag" (if you've ever seen Mike Myers in Austin Powers, you can take a wild guess what the song refers to) might be fun to play as pillow talk. But the rest of the selections seemed rather uninspired. Heck, even the band's cover of "Wild Thing" was insipid; I half-expect to hear it the next time I find myself shopping at the local A&P.

I can't put my finger on why exactly this CD just doesn't come together, but it's biggest problem would have to be the lead vocalist Jason Levine's whiny voice. The best songs on Hot Show are the tracks that co-bandmember Milo performs.

Hot Show has a few decent songs and that's about it. A marginal thumbs-down from me.

billie
Honey to the B
Chrysalis Music

BY VIRGINIA WIGMORE

"Music to the ear is like honey to the bee and this is me."

- billie

billie's debut album Honey to the B is appropriately titled, because the album is best described as an annoying insect buzzing in your ear.

If the prom queen of your high school was to put out a CD, it would sound similar to this - fluffy, like cotton candy. The CD booklet is plastered with up-close shots of billie in various outfits (great, if you into that sort of thing), but instead of looking like a fashion model, billie looks like she just did a shoot for the Sears Catalogue.

It is difficult to take billie's music seriously when she dots the i's in her name with a crown and a heart. This is a girl that is so desperate to be popular, that her e-mail and home address are printed on the CD case.

Her single "Because We Want To", familiar to Top 40 fans, is the sassiest one on the album and not a good indication of the rest of the CD. Most of the other songs are fixated on the love theme, with songs like "Girlfriend" and "I dream I'm dancing" exploring the range of possible highschool romances. All of the songs are very repetitive, and sound like silly ditties your housemates would create just to be annoying.

For the same type of music, but with more originality, the Mini Pops would be a better investment.

Prozzak
Hot Show
Sony Music

BY ELI SCHUSTER

Of all the CDs I've reviewed so far, Prozzak's Hot Show has been one of the most difficult. Why, you ask? Well, I found it so non-descriptive that it was really difficult to concentrate on the songs. Most of it seemed so much like atmosphere music that my mind often wandered off to other things.

It's biggest problem would have to be the lead vocalist Jason Levine's whiny voice.

That's not to say Hot Show is a bad CD; rather, it just didn't pique my interest very much. If I had to define the band's "sound," I might call it a strange combination of soft guitar rock and throbbing dance beats punctuated by a nasally-voiced English dude who annoyed the piss out of me.

A few of the dance tunes such as "Europa", "Tsunami", and "I Like to Watch (Milo's

Thinking Kings

Philosopher Kings rip the stage next week

CONCERT PREVIEW

BY GREGORY DOLE

One of the most unique groups in Canada will be playing at Grant Hall next Thursday. When the Philosopher Kings come to town, you best be there. It will be a highlight of the concert series put on this year by the Queen's Entertainment Agency.

Forget your hip-hop shout-outs, your backbone slides at Alfie's Pub, and your Gypsy Sol at Clark. (I'd mention the Quiet Pub, but apparently they can't have live music anymore.) The point is, Queen's hasn't had this kind of funk and soul, my brother reader.

The Philosopher Kings are touring Canada in support of their new album Famous, Rich and Beautiful. If you were to pick one word to describe their latest work, it would have to be sex.

I mean, let's not beat around the bush. For these Philosopher Kings, the only enlightenment they want to share is the act of getting it on. Old dead white men from History 121, these guys are not. Don't think Socrates and Plato, rather Marvin Gaye and Burt Bacharach. Many music reviewers have likened the Philosopher Kings to Marvin Gaye. I have jumped on the bandwagon. While for years I denied the potency of sensuous groove-sters like Marvin, I had an epiphany last week. Driving along the highway, my radio came upon Marvin's classic "Mercy me (the ecology)." I suddenly appreciated the power of Marvin's song. Later that day, I heard the Philosopher Kings' hit "You Don't Love Me (like you used to do)." Besides having a subtitle in parentheses, both songs have more sensuality than anything old Hugh Hefner will ever publish. These guys want you to get it on.

I remember their debut album's hit song "Charms." It was good, but not that good. Oh, what wonders Father Time can do.

Actually, over the course of the past few years, the group toured with lovers such as Al Green and G. Love and Special Sauce. Green's classics like "I'm so in love with you" can't get any more down than the title itself. As for G.Love, I am reminded of a time his drummer said, "what can I say about our live shows. Will you get laid after the show? Most likely." All these loving vibes must have rubbed off on our Canadian lads.

The group's lead singer Gerald Eaton said: "We took a more lazy approach to writing and even recording. We laboured desperately to get to a point where we could start writing songs that were unlaboured, unforced."

The new album is material guaranteed to get you busy every time. "Hurts to Love You" was the first single released earlier this year. Great song. Currently the group is getting crazy airplay for "You Don't Love Me (like you used to do)" and the similar french version. Two great takes, one great tune. The rest of the album chugs along with the same dedication to the pleasure of the flesh. I mean this defines the term "devil's music."

All of the above leads me to believe this will be a hot concert. If you are looking for love, you may not get it but you will certainly hear it next Thursday at Grant Hall. In the meantime, we can only hope the QEA turns the lights down low.

Advances in Improbable Research

A seminar/slide show presenting outstandingly improbable research, a surprising amount of it genuine, from The Annals of Improbable Research. The talk includes highlights from the Ig Nobel Prize Ceremonies held annually at Harvard. Topics span the full range of the sciences and beyond, including: The Taxonomy of Apples and Oranges; Xerox Micrography; Tabletop Fusion; Feline Reactions to Bearded Men; and diverse other areas of research. Heckling is encouraged, as are lab coats and other appropriate and inappropriate regalia.

ical moments took away from some of the dramatic effect of the play.

For me the play succeeded primarily because it awoke questions raised when I first read the novel.

In large part, the actors were the true strength of the play. Each character's unique identity was drawn out. Particularly impressive was Clayton Garrett as Lennie, the play's most pivotal and demanding role. Garrett brought out Lennie's innocence as well as exhibiting his terrifying strength. Both Lennie and George are riveting in the play's final scene, which was staged perfectly.

For me the play succeeded primarily because it awoke questions raised when I first read the novel. Parallels between crippled Candy, Candy's dog, and Lennie are inescapable. Is there a place for them in society or are their handicaps too great for our utility-maximizing culture? The play's tragic ending still disturbs me and leaves my questions unanswered.

In all John Steinbeck would be proud. His classic work Of Mice and Men, has been wonderfully reproduced.

In all John Steinbeck would be proud. His classic work Of Mice and Men, has been wonderfully reproduced and continues some 70 years after its creation to be both relevant and thought-provoking.

Of Mice and Men is playing Nov 13-14 and 18-21 starting at 8:00 pm at Theatre 5, 370 King St W.

ART REVIEW

Lamentation
The Modern Fuel Gallery

By CHARMIAN LOVE

Rose Stewart has transformed the Modern Fuel Gallery into a sizzling and almost overpowering space of pure expression.

After completing undergraduate work at The University of Windsor and The University of Toronto (B.A., B.Ed.), Stewart, native to Linz, Austria, has spent time studying at art schools in Mexico and The Netherlands. She has participated in many Kingston shows, including at the 1994-1996 "Kingston Women Artists" show at The Edward Day Gallery. Now she has brought her breadth of experience to the

The show "Lamentation" was done in response to the end of her marriage. The pieces become the tribute to her journey towards recovery and resignation, and also chart of the emotions and experiences along the way.

Stewart has successfully captured the feelings that the end of her marriage created, and brilliantly expressed them through her series of six oil paintings entitled "Dear Rose." Here, totally exposed and vulnerable, Stewart shows us her anger. Imbedded in the fiery magenta and red colours are fragments of a letter her husband wrote her, terminating their marriage. This shared intimacy draws the viewer closer into the painting, where they can read the fragments which say things like "I will not come back to you... I came face to face within myself." The paint strokes are erratic, which directly reflect the emotions Stewart was feeling at the time of their creation. Towards the end of the series we see a bit more order, and some blues penetrating through the fierce hot colours, which may symbolize the light of her impending acceptance.

A less eye catching, but just as energetic, series on display entitled simply "Reflections" comprises another substantial part of the exhibit. Consisting of six black and white drawings, these works contrast with the brightly coloured paintings, indicating, perhaps a revelation in thought. From a distance, these works are reminiscent, of smaller scale, Picasso's Guernica. They contain a lot of conflict and movement, showing yet another step on her road to resignation. The work is very abstract and linear. Each of these smaller scale drawings, although separate, seem to flow into its neighbour. Words from her guest book best describe the ambience of the room, "the art really moves and sings" with "nice movement and chaos."

Expressionism, because it reflects the emotions of the artist, directly impressed upon canvas or paper, is difficult to write about. Only the artist truly knows how he or she feels, but it does give an opportunity for the viewer to see what that artist is trying to suggest and have their own individual reaction to the work. Rose Stewart expresses her audience her personal journey through the progression of her feelings in a thoughtful way. She has given viewers a glimpse of the anguish and recovery during an important part of her life. When walking away from the gallery, you can feel the bond that the artist has developed with us by sharing her feelings in "Lamentation," by letting us into her world.

The Modern Fuel Gallery will be presenting Lamentation Wednesday - Saturday 12 - 4:30 p.m. until December 11.

in brief

You know I'm Bad: A law suit between Michael Jackson and the tabloid The Mirror has been settled. The suit is a result of four photographs that were published of the star in The Mirror in 1992. The photos claim that Jackson's face was disfigured due to plastic surgery. Though the tabloid did strongly stand by the photos validity, they now admit that the photos did not necessary represent Jackson's true appearance to its full extent. And the difference is...

Please help me: George Martin, who produced the Beatles Love me do and the Beatles Anthology, has retired but before celebrating with one last album. Martin is in the process of creating his final album which will include Celine Dion, Phil Collins, and Robin Williams singing "Come Together," while Jim Carrey will do a rendition of "I am the Walrus." Walrus indeed.

The Queen is Dead?: The Queen has come back to life on screen. Elizabeth portrays the true story of Queen Elizabeth whose reign lasted four decades in the 16th century. Elizabeth is played by actress Cate Blanchett who won the role over Nicole Kidman and Titanic's Kate Winslet. Shine's Geoffrey Rush takes on the role of Elizabeth's advisor.

Tommy Boy: The media has found yet another way to prolong the Clinton Scandal. Fashion ads are the ticket. Fashion guru Tommy Hilfger has already published an ad featuring a young woman sitting on a desk in a room that resembles the White House oval office. The ads were printed despite objections from White House officials. Please, stop.

The Skinny on Vinny: Joe Pesci has started a new career in singing. Pesci who portrayed a hilariously neurotic lawyer named Vinny in My Cousin Vinny has just released a CD titled "My Cousin Vinny Sings." The CD has Pesci belting out tunes and wisecracks reminiscent of his character. However, this isn't Pesci's first singing gig. In the sixties, Pesci was part of the musical group "Joey Pee and the Starlighters." Yup, a talented yute he was.

¡el PRIMERO DUELO GRANDE de Misceláneo! EL HOMBRE LOCO SEAN SPRINGER CONTRA EL HOMBRE RABIOSO JESSE C. BELLINGER

This issue marks the first installment in an ongoing series of heated showdowns in the Miscellaneous section. Witness as Features Editor Sean Springer (Below Left) and Reader Editor Jesse "Craig" Bellinger (Below Right) attempt to defame each other with nothing but their wits and sleep deprivation. NEXT WEEK: A die-hard Raffi fan will be pitted against a Fred Penner fanatic. And sparks will fly.

OCTOBER 21, 11:58 PM. I'm darting for The Journal, where fellow editorial board member and former friend, one Jesse Craig Fuckdinger, is waiting impatiently for what is, by far, the best article of my life. Little did I know I was entering a whole new dimension of journalism. Call it... the editor-HORR-ial zone.

DON'T! Stroke of midnight. Tiptoeing into The Journal — so I wouldn't disturb Jesse's train of thought — I crept quietly over to where the hated Reader editor was sitting slouched and looking dumfounded, as always. A large, bright green and blue parrot sat perched on his left bicep and in his right hand he held a near-empty 60-ounce bottle of gin. Reeking of alcohol, thick sperm and parrot poo, his extremities looked as if they hadn't been bathed or groomed in months: Ed Grimly hairstyle, facial spaghetti stains, splattered ink all over the pants and a striped "Who Farted?" t-shirt.

Apparently, I had interrupted an article in progress. Looking at the screen though, I saw that he had only written, «All edit and no write makes Jesse a dull editor.» over and over again. «Nice parrot, Jesse. Yours?» I politely inquired.

The parrot cut in: «I'm Percyl GAWK! Jesse fucked up big time! I'm Percyl GAWK! Jesse fucked up big time!»

Jesse stared at the monitor and was silent for about eight seconds, then stole a massive swig from the gin, turned to me, lifted his eyebrows to the crown of his head, widened his eyes and hissed, «Why don't you go fuck yourself then get the fuck out of here?»

Thinking that we were engaged in a bit, I played along. «Oh, you mean after I fuck your sister, right?» Jesse lunged his left hand up to my face and let out a scream that sounded like it came from the annals of hell itself. «SILENCE! I will not have my editorial agenda compromised by your stupid... stupidity!» He grabbed my neck and squeezed — hard. In a voice identical to Zuul's from Ghostbusters, he seethed, «Give me my fucking article... now.» I promptly handed him a disk and printed sheets of the article. He released his grip, flopped the papers onto the floor, unzipped his pants, pulled out his one-and-a-half-inch schlong and proceeded to urinate all over the article.

«Scan,» he said, «This is what I'm going to turn your article into when I'm finished with it. Nothing but paper, ink and fresh urine.»

He was right. After loading the article up onto the screen, Jesse «the Butcher» Bellinger severed every morsel of wit, charm and style the article formerly possessed and befed it up with his own vulgar blend of verbal diarrhea — «Jesselism.» Phrases like «...the beauty of Smith's work is evident in the vibrancy emanating from his natural gift for imagery.» were swapped with, «Golly gee whiz, that Smith is really good. Man, oh man. I think that book was so stinkin' good.»

My byline became attached to a cesspool of incoherence for which I can only blame Jesse, who has proven himself totally maladroitt in the role of editor. I sat and watched the horror show until 2 p.m. when Jesse lost all motor skills and passed out on the floor like a bowl of jell-O-tine. In the process he crushed his poor parrot and lost a handle on the bottle of gin, which smashed into smithereens.

As Jesse began blowing heaps of flatulence out from his ass, I hit the [DELETE] key, tore the paper up into shreds, repossessed the disk and ran breathlessly for my life. Traumatized with a capital T, I haven't been the same since and will never, ever again pass a sentence the way of J.C.B. The moral? Juicy Egg Humdinger is not to be trusted with the English language. EVER!

One more thing: Jesse is also a chronic liar. Known as «Bellinger bullshit,» his stories are the childish fabrications of his illicit affairs with some of Queen's most desirable sheep (his version is that he's «scored» with more women than Will Chamberlain. Sadly, I've been told by his parole officer that, in reality, he's only scored with more chimpanzees than Tarzan and with more hookers than Charlie Sheen).

And get this: he's been telling everyone that he's a doctor of proctology. Hal! Besides being quite an ass himself and knowing a thing or two about poodle vasectomies, Dr. Bellinger thinks that condoms are what you put on your hamburger and that the rectum is Queen's only student-elected officer.

Situation interpreted by Sean Springer who swears by his left nut that everything printed is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth so help him please.

AS A DOCTOR, I must admit that patients are sometimes referred to us from whom we would rather run screaming from the hospital rather than treat, ethics notwithstanding. Sean Springer is one of those patients.

Sean Springer was referred to me after repeated incidents involving Sean on Queen's campus. The situation came to a head on the night of October 21st, 1998, when Sean was discovered by a Journal editor lying prone and stark naked, while lying upon a broken bottle of gin on the front stairs of the Journal house. Upon stabilizing, he insisted that he had been sexually assaulted by an over-sized parrot with the head of Bea Arthur named «Percy.» The case landed on my desk several days later.

Right away there was something about Sean that I disliked. Something that reeked of the kind of fuzzy, almost hair-like mould that slowly accumulates on the inside of undercooked leftovers over weeks of neglect in an otherwise empty refrigerator. Something that reminded me of the time in the fifth grade that I discovered my best friend necking with his mother in their backyard. But I had a job to do.

I told myself that every scintilla, salacious and sanctimonious insult he hurled at me somehow made me a more effective doctor. Just knowing Sean, I soon came to understand, made me a bigger person. By mid-November, having endured just three weeks of working with Sean, I was a huge person. Larger even than his McDonald's super-size fries ego. Sean loves McDonald's fries. He often sticks them up his nostrils, sings «I am the Power!», beats his chest and calls it performance art. The one time an anonymous editorial board member attempted to interrupt the «performance,» Sean repudiated the insurrection with a barrage of used condoms and fecal matter. Much of it landed on a group of generous and unsuspecting benefactors who had congregated at The Journal house to announce their initiative to establish a fund which would facilitate the free tuition of every student at Queen's. They immediately canceled their offer but granted it instead to McGill, U of T and Western. Sean called it «prophylactic justice.» I believe he was on crack. Only now, at the end, do I understand. It wasn't the crack. Nor was it the copious amounts of alcohol, the methadone, the heroin or the syphilis that drove Sean to these manic chamber-potted, puss-infected trap doors of the soul. It was not the electro-shock treatment, the genital piercings or hair removal surgery. None of these things can explain Sean's outbursts of incoherent drivel, spectacularly offensive monologues and utter lack of self-perception. After three weeks of intensive observation, four restraining orders, $4,300 in damages and five separate medical institutions, Sean Springer has been diagnosed with cranium rectilitus.

Having your head shoved up your ass can be a painful and debilitating condition. Sean requires our sympathy and should be forgiven for his frequent and public masturbatory frenzies, his foul-smelling breath and suspicious predilection for small animals. After all, it's not entirely his fault! He is in the very awkward position of having his head shoved up his ass. Imagine the embarrassment, the abject humiliation he must endure. For Sean, every day is an indistinguishable morass of fecal-smelling misery.

The prognosis for Sean is not good. Although he has been treated with a variety of phenothiazines, none have been effective. The spastic shuffle with which he now walks is a direct result of the high doses of thorazine currently being administered; please don't say anything to him about it. It's hard enough for Sean just stumbling down the hallway and drooling. He doesn't need your further debasement. Furthermore, the lingering after-effects of a decade of hardcore drug and alcohol abuse have left whatever minuscule portion of Sean's brain that originally functioned debilitated and only semi-operable. Vacant stares, sudden outbursts of bile and hallucinations (often, for some unknown reason, of various birds in embarrassingly-sexual positions) are common and, sadly, chronic.

Please take pity on those less fortunate than ourselves, and endure their pathetic attempts to grasp at the chafed and flaccid discarded remnants of straws that they call life. It may be their only redeeming feature.

SARAH'S RECIPE CORNER

CHICKEN IN PEANUT SAUCE OVER RICE WITH SNOWPEAS

THIS RECIPE SERVES TWO, but you can easily double it. The ingredients are easily accessible, however, snowpeas can be expensive, so if your budget is tight just use green beans. [Note that they need about five extra minutes cooking time.]

*Start the rice first, and prepare the chicken and snowpeas during the thirty minutes cooking time of the rice.

For the rice you'll need:

- 1 cup of uncooked non-instant rice
- 2 cups of water
- 1 tsp. of salt

*Combine these ingredients in a medium-sized saucepan. Stir, cover, and bring to a boil. Stir again and reduce heat to low and cook covered for 30 minutes (no peeking! That's what makes rice sticky). Stir, recover, and let stand five minutes.

For the chicken you'll need:

- 3 chicken breasts (cut into bite-sized pieces)
- 1 diced onion
- 2 tsp. of oil
- 1/2 cup of water

- 1/3 cup of peanut butter
- 3-4 tbsp. of soy sauce
- pepper

*Brown the chicken and onions in the oil in a frying pan, stir occasionally. *Add the peanut butter a little at a time (let it melt as you go). *Add the soy sauce and water gradually, sprinkle with black pepper, and cook for a few minutes - until the sauce is thick (if it becomes too dry, just add a little water and mix well.)

For the snowpeas you'll need:

- 2 cups of washed snowpeas (with ends trimmed)
- 2 tsp. of oil
- 1 clove of garlic, minced
- 1 green onion, sliced
- salt & pepper

*Brown the garlic in the oil in a frying pan or saucepan. *Sauté the green onion with the garlic for about a minute. *Add the snowpeas and cook uncovered on medium heat, stir occasionally. *Add salt and pepper to taste.

*Serve the chicken over the rice with the snowpeas on the side.

CAMPUS COMMUNITY CAMPAIGN

Dear Students,

Queen's is about to embark on its most ambitious fund-raising campaign ever, and students will play a vital role in it. The Campaign for Queen's will raise money for our most urgent needs on campus.

The first phase of the new campaign will focus on the campus community: students, staff, faculty, senior administration, governing board members and retirees. I am pleased to report that George Dyke, Sc'98, and Alison Loat, Arts'98, have agreed to co-chair the student portion of the campaign. Both bring exceptional leadership skills and a deep dedication and commitment to Queen's. They are now recruiting a team of students who will help them in their efforts.

Over the next few months, you will hear and read much more about the campaign, through The Journal, Golden Words and through other media. I encourage you to get involved and to become well informed about the campaign and its progress. Please contact your volunteer committee for more information, or contact the campus community campaign office at 545-6000 (extension 5286) or ccc3@post.queensu.ca.

Queen's students have a tradition of giving that is unparalleled in this country. Thousands of your predecessors made a commitment to this University to benefit the generations that followed them. I hope you will carry this legacy forward.

Queen's defies enrolment trend

Enrolment at Ontario universities down, but on the rise at Queen's

By ROBERT MACNEIL

According to Statistics Canada, the number of full-time undergraduate students in Ontario universities has decreased by 1.4 per cent this year, but enrolment at Queen's has actually increased.

The provincial decline has been attributed to a combination of higher tuition fees, university funding cuts and a strong economy that is creating jobs not requiring university education.

"We may be seeing the intersection between the job market and the rising costs of university," said Queen's Principal Bill Leggett.

According to Alma Mater Society President Tom Stanley, "The government cut funding and made student loans more difficult to qualify for. Now we have Ontario students saying that they can't afford to go to school in this province. The Ontario government needs to take responsibility for their actions."

"Queen's is an anomaly because of its reputation," said Stanley. "It will be able to charge higher tuition and get alumni support but provincially this is a different story," he said, adding it would be "naive to think the broader provincial picture won't affect us."

Leggett echoed Stanley's comments regarding Queen's enviable position. "We are quite fortunate at Queen's, we have had a strong demand for admission," he said.

While Ontario experienced a decline, university enrolment in British Columbia experienced a 15 per cent increase. This has been attributed to the government's tuition freeze.

"It's not a coincidence that British Columbia has instituted a tuition freeze and their enrolment has jumped dramatically. Ontario has cut over $400 million from post-secondary education and allowed tuition to jump more than $10,000 in some programs, and now we are seeing the results," argued Stanley.

Photos removed from Comm resumé books

By FIONA STEVENSON

Queen's Commerce resumé books will no longer include photos as a result of a decision made by the School of Business late last week. The decision was announced in yesterday's edition of The Commentator, the Queen's Commerce Society Newsletter.

The resumé book is a collection of the graduating class's resúmes which is compiled by the Commerce Career Centre annually and distributed to approximately 800 companies that may recruit Queen's Commerce students. All students' photos are included in the book, although students have the option of being excluded entirely from the publication.

Queen's is currently the only Canadian undergraduate business program which includes photos in their student resumé publication.

During second term last year, some concerns were raised in the School of Business that the inclusion of photos in the resumé books may be a violation of the Ontario Human Rights code. A proposal recommending the removal photos from the resumé books was passed at the March 18 Commerce Society meeting, with 14 in favour, 11 against and three abstentions. However, the School of Business had to ratify the change of policy in order for the decision to be finalized.

"The issue arose last spring and over the course of the summer I had a couple of discussions with the Human Rights Office on the issue," explained Tom Anger, chair of the Commerce program. Anger said the Commerce program's final decision was based on input from the ComSoc executive, the Commerce Equality Issues Committee and the Human Rights Office. "I've also talked

Queen's reputation slips in Maclean's

By TARA MANSBRIDGE

On Monday Maclean's magazine released its annual ranking of universities across Canada and this year, there were some surprises for Queen's.

While Queen's overall ranking of second (the University of Toronto was ranked first) was news to few, some of the changes in standing have resulted in both alarm and praise. The largest changes in Queen's standing occurred in the classes, finances and reputation sections of the ranking.

In classes, Queen's was ranked 11th out of 15 in first and second-year class size, and last in the number of classes taught by tenured faculty. In finances, Queen's outshone all other universities in the scholarships & bursaries category, which ranks schools according to the percentage of their budget that is allocated to those two financial aids.

The largest change in ranking, and most concerning to some, was taken in the reputation section. Queen's ranked fifth in Alumni Support and sixth in the Reputation Survey. In order to come up with these rankings, Maclean's magazine surveyed chief executive officers of major companies, university administrators and high-school guidance counsellors across Canada.

Some students are worried about what the Maclean's report says about the future value of a degree from Queen's.

"I am concerned about the reputation survey," said Dawn Robertson, Arts '99, citing the fact that Queen's reputation with employers will affect her future career opportunities. "Overall, it seemed to be that the students were really carrying the school," she said.

Queen's considers gender neutral degree

BY ALISON MITCHELL

Should graduates have the option of having a gender neutral title on their degree?

This is an issue that many universities, including Queen's, have had to consider several times in the past decade.

The issue was most recently raised by Gayle Sadler, E-MBA '99. In August she wrote a formal letter to Tony Dimnik, director national of the executive MBA program Class of 1999.

"Upon my impending graduation from the Queen's University Executive MBA program in May 1999, I would like the title of my degree to be a gender neutral name," she wrote.

In her letter Sadler proposed that graduates have the option of having the word "Magisteriate" as the title of their degree. She felt that this word was more gender inclusive than the word "Master."

"I just want my degree to reflect what is important to me," added Sadler.

"It seems like there is an overreaction to it... It's a small thing that can be done that only a small number of people would take advantage of," added Sadler.

Dimnik then forwarded her request to the Queen's Senate Committee on Academic Procedure (SCAP).

This isn't the first time that this issue has been on the SCAP's agenda, although this option still does not exist at Queen's for graduate students.

The issue was raised in 1990 when two students asked if their undergraduate degrees could be titled "Sister" instead of "Bachelor."

At the time, SCAP decided to defer the decision to the Council of Ontario Universities, who the committee believed was looking into the issue. COU did not end up pursuing the matter, and no policy was established.

But now, eight years later, the matter is back on SCAP's "to do" list.

Currently, there is only one degree at Queen's that has a gender neutral degree title option: the Arts and Science undergraduate degree. Until three years ago, the Latin word for "Bachelor" on the degree was a masculine word, but in 1995 that word was changed to "Baccalaureatum," a gender neutral Latin term.

ArtsSci undergraduates have the option of having the Latin on their degree translated to English on the other side of their diploma. If they choose this option, the University translates the word "Baccalaureatum" as "Bachelor."

A subcommittee of SCAP plans to consult with deans, faculty members, and perhaps students, and after discussing the issue at length, they will present a recommendation to the Senate who will then vote on the issue. A decision is expected to be reached some time this year.

"People should be able to have their preferred wording," said Dimnik. "But there is a legitimate concern as to what degree it is that you've actually received. [There] is the confusion with the word-

P&CC ad garners criticism

BY MAGGIE BUHAJCYK

"Spare Change for Beer! Please." This caption, used recently in a Publishing and Copy Centre advertisement, raised questions on campus about the use of stereotypes in advertising.

The ad, which appeared in the November 13 edition of The Journal, featured a photograph of two homeless men holding up a sign that read, "Spare Change for Beer! Please." In order to advertise their binding service, the P&CC placed their own caption, "Maybe if I'd had my essay's bound at the P&CC, I'd have change for my own beer..." on the ad.

"I have spoken to Gord Moodie [AMS vp-ops] and suggested putting together guidelines for advertising with respect to social issues."

— Naomi Brunemeyer, AMS social issues commissioner

Naomi Brunemeyer, Alma Mater Society social issues commissioner, said she has received two official complaints about the ad. The P&CC "thought it was humorous and didn't realize they were perpetuating stereotypes," she said.

Some students said they found the ad inappropriate or offensive. "I don't think it's a good ad to begin with, besides being politically incorrect," said Mika Solway, Sci '01.

Ryan Bekkevold, Arts '01, agreed. "I'm sure they could be a little more tasteful. What do homeless people have to do with photocopying?"

Kevin Deonarine, marketing and design manager for the P&CC, said he based the ad around the actual sign, and not the impoverished men. "We hadn't thought it through as clearly as we should have," said Deonarine, who has created all of this year's P&CC ads.

"I didn't think implications could be made in that respect," he said. Deonarine added that he found "irony in a gentleman who is homeless holding up an ad for beer."

"When I saw it in print, I realized I had made a mistake. I am sorry for offending people," he said. "I had very little time to produce an ad and that was one we had been playing with in the past."

The photograph itself was downloaded from the Internet and is the work of Philip Greenspun, a well-known photographer. "The Copy Centre, in the past, has used many of his images," said Deonarine.

Tara Mansbridge, co-editor-in-chief of The Journal, said the newspaper's advertising policy is directed by the law. "We won't print anything libelous or illegal," she said. "I didn't find it tasteful but my personal opinion should not interfere with free speech and expression."

Mansbridge also said The Journal received the ad rather late. "We got it electronically so we didn't see the proof on paper," she added. "I could have called the presses and stopped them but I didn't think it was of sufficient magnitude to do that."

Brunemeyer said the AMS is responding to the complaints about the ad. "I have spoken to Gord Moodie [AMS vice-president, operations] and suggested putting together guidelines for advertising with respect to social issues," she said.

AIDS Awareness Week highlights new issues

BY REBECCA STELTER

Members of the Queen's and Kingston communities will have an opportunity to increase their understanding of HIV and AIDS during AIDS Awareness Week, which runs from November 23 — 30 and coincides with World AIDS Day on December 1.

"It makes sense to have the two together, partly because the previous date in September was overshadowed by the AIDS Walk," said Allison Cope, education coordinator for HIV/AIDS Regional Services (HARS) for the Kingston area. "Now, with World AIDS Day, this week is a Canadian and International focus on awareness."

16,000 individuals are diagnosed with the AIDS virus each day worldwide, with approximately 7,000 of these cases occurring in individuals under the age of 24, said Cope. In Canada, 5,000 new AIDS infection cases arise each year, half of which infect individuals under the age of 23.

Cope emphasized the seriousness of these statistics. "There's a big epidemic. People seem to think that it's under control and it's not," she said.

This year's AIDS Awareness activities at Queen's will be somewhat different from previous years. "Issues addressed will be things like women and AIDS, cocaine use and AIDS, steroid use and AIDS, among others," said Naomi Brunemeyer, AMS social issues commissioner.

"I think that people are very aware [of AIDS]," said Brunemeyer, "but they have a tendency to be misinformed about how people get HIV. They know that having unprotected sex, or sharing needles can lead to HIV and AIDS, but they never think that it can happen to them."

The HARS AIDS Awareness Week will focus on raising awareness in youth as, "that's where the infections occur," said Cope. As a result, Cope said one of the most important activities her group is organizing for AIDS Awareness Week will be a workshop held next Friday geared towards "making health information and services accessible to youth."

The services available at HARS include public education, support services for those infected with HIV or AIDS, and AIDS advocacy.

In regards to AIDS testing, Cope said, "We don't give out the test ourselves, but we do provide pre- and post-test counselling."

"There's a big epidemic. People seem to think that it's under control and it's not."

— Allison Cope, education coordinator for HIV/AIDS Regional Services

To be tested for HIV on campus, a student can go to the Student Health Centre. This service is "confidential, not anonymous," said Brunemeyer. "There is a file kept on you, but no one has access to it."

Brunemeyer explained that, if positive, the Ministry of Health may choose to intervene. "They decide whether they need to take responsibility to find out who your sexual partners were," she said, in order to trace the virus; however, this procedure is not followed in every case.

Completely anonymous HIV testing can be obtained at the Kingston Health Unit, said Brunemeyer.

Brunemeyer commented that one of the highlights of the week will be a presentation by Ki Namaste, a health care worker dealing with transgendered individuals. The discussion will take place at 7 p.m. on Thursday in Botterell Hall.

Success undebateable

BY ANNA NESBITT

The Queen's Debating Union has enjoyed a successful beginning to its 155th season, despite the union's lack of student funding this year.

The union was the only group to lose last year's spring referendum, when their request for a continued $0.35 mandatory fee was endorsed by only 49.53 per cent of voters. This is the union's first year without student funding.

Regardless of this year's lack of student fees, the debating team is attempting to maintain their high level of competition. "It's been more challenging, we've had to really examine how to get as many people to as many tournaments as possible for as cheaply as possible," said Mike Podgorski, president of the QDU.

"It's been more challenging, we've had to really examine how to get as many people to as many tournaments as possible for as cheaply as possible."

— Mike Podgorski, president of the QDU

The team is resorting to alternate methods of fundraising this year.

"We have an alumni program that we have been fostering in the past few years," said Podgorski. "Also, this year we're not sending a team to the International competition because it's in the Philippines," he said, explaining that although this would take away from the team's international experience, it would allow more members opportunity to compete locally.

The union has been involved in a number of competitions this year and, so far, has had members placing favourably. At the Central Canadian Championships, held in Ottawa, the team placed fifth overall. Individually Podgorski took third place and teammate Dan Lafferty, QDU's critic of the house, placed seventh.

The team is trying not to limit themselves to a provincial or even a national level. "We're trying to get as much experience on both a national and international level, and [experience] for students of different calibers," said Podgorski.

Mike Podgorski, president of the Queen's Debating Union.

Podgorski said the team also tries to protect novice spots. The union sent 14 novices to a tournament at Western University this fall.

"We've been having solid results across Canada and we're competing for the first time in the Ivy Leagues at Brown College in the United States," said Podgorski.

"Two major upcoming events are the North American tournament at Smith College and the national tournament at Western University where we're aiming to do very well," he said.

The club has regained its student funding for next year, as a result of last year's referendum. The establishment of a $0.95 opt-outable fee was supported by 61.5 per cent of students. Podgorski is positive about the outcome. "With fees being reinstated it looks good for the future," he said.

Thinner condoms introduced in Canada

By MITRA MANOUCHEHRIAN

For the condom connoisseur, the choices are endless: Lifestyles, Ramses, Sheik, Trojan, even Black Jack. Then there's also lubricated, with spermicide or without, ribbed, ultra-thin, form-fitting, pina colada flavour. The mysterious code of condom shopping will continue to expand thanks to a new type of condom that will hit stores in Canada soon.

"Thinner condoms have been sold for years in other countries, such as Japan, and they have had no significant rates of breakage that we are aware of."

— Andrew Douglas, standards officer for Health and Welfare Canada's medical devices bureau

As a result of recent changes to Health and Welfare Canada's regulations regarding condom standards, thinner condoms are now permitted on Canadian store shelves.

The topic is especially timely because condom use will be emphasized as Queen's and the local community recognize AIDS Awareness Week, beginning next Monday.

Until their recent modification, Canadian regulations regarding condom standards were far more stringent than those in the rest of the world and, as a result, many thinner condoms were kept off the Canadian market. The regulations were changed on July 1, bringing Canadian medical product standards in line with the standards of the International Standards Organization.

Nicole Bell, co-director of the Queen's Sexual Health Resource centre said, in the "debate between safety and pleasure," the centre would be more willing to err on the side of safety and dispense only the more durable condoms.

Condoms are tested for safety based on three tests. The first measures burst pressure, the air pressure being exerted in the condom at the time it bursts. The second measures bursting volume, or the volume of air contained in the condom at bursting pressure. The third measures leakage when filled with water.

Under Health and Welfare Canada's previous regulations, all condoms sold in Canada had to hold a volume of no less than 25 litres of air without bursting, a standard held nowhere else in the world. Under ISO's standards, condoms require a lower burst volume, as low as 12-15 litres of air.

Before this change, many imported condoms were not allowed on Canadian shelves as they would fail the 25-litre burst volume test. With these new regulations, however, condoms as thin as 0.02 mm are now available.

"I think that thinner condoms are a better idea because it will bring the feeling back, and more males will be inclined to use them."

— Shamir Chandarana, ArtSci '00

Andrew Douglas, standards officer for Health and Welfare Canada's medical devices bureau, said he believes these condoms are "just as effective, if used correctly."

"Thinner condoms have been sold for years in other countries, such as Japan, and they have had no significant rates of breakage that we are aware of," he said.

Douglas said the possible problems with these new condoms don't lie in their breakage rates, but in the way they are handled, "as thinner condoms tend to have a smaller and thinner rim, the chances of being unable to unroll them properly is higher," he said.

The main concern isn't that they will break in use, but that they'll be sold to an inexperienced market who aren't aware of how to use them properly, Douglas explained.

Diane Nolting, health educator at Queen's Student Health Services said it would be "interesting from an educational point of view to run a survey [and] gather data to find out what people's experiences are with these condoms."

As a health educator, she is interested in finding out about possible breakage rates in order to determine if better education regarding condom use is needed, she said.

"I think thinner condoms would be great," said Ted Fleming, Sci '00. "You could make better water balloons out of them."

Shamir Chandarana, ArtSci '00 agreed, "I think that thinner condoms are a better idea because it will bring the feeling back, and more males will be inclined to use them."

In the meantime, the success of the newer, thinner condoms will be left in the hands of the consumer, so to speak.

Part-time enrolment drops across Ontario

Milan Konopek is not surprised by the figures. He said students have known for a while that these cuts would have an effect, and said he hopes "the government realizes Ontario is losing out."

"We are quite fortunate at Queen's, we have had a strong demand for admission."

— Principal Bill Leggett

Konopek said he would like to see the High School Liaison program, which is run by the Queen's administration, inform high school students on the affects of deregulation and OSAP restrictions, "to give a dose of reality along with Queen's spirit."

The greatest drop in student enrolment continues to be in part-time studies. Five years ago, 100,000 part-time students were enrolled in universities across Canada. This year there are 76,000. David Scott of the Council of Ontario Universities attributed this drop to a growing economy in which people are less likely to take the time to further their education.

According to Leggett, before this academic year, the Queen's Senate addressed the problem of lost revenue from a lack of part-time students. "[We] planned to increase full-time enrolment to compensate for the part-time decline," said Leggett.

Both Konopek and Stanley pointed out another possible reason for the decline. "Part-time students aren't going back because they are not eligible for OSAP [as students] need to take a 60 per cent course load," to receive assistance, Konopek said.

"[We] have written to the government expressing our concerns," said Leggett, "a Senate committee is looking into [different] in student funding."

"The Ontario government completely eliminated part-time students from being eligible for student loans," said Stanley.

Fine Art student's work rewarded Chu's design wins honourable mention in provincial competition

By MANDY MARRIOT

The work of a second-year Queen's Fine Art student was honoured by the provincial government last Thursday at an awards ceremony at Conestoga College in Kitchener.

Cyril Frederick Chu, Arts '01, was awarded an honourable mention in the design competition for the new Ontario Medal for Young Volunteers. He was awarded a plaque recognizing his participation in the contest and a $500 prize.

Last January, student artists and designers from all Ontario colleges and universities were invited to create an original design to be used by the Province of Ontario for the face of the Ontario Medal for Young Volunteers.

The medal is an award for young people who have made volunteer contributions to their communities, and will be presented to up to 10 young people annually, commencing this year. The inaugural award ceremony will take place this January.

Sixteen students contributed designs for the medal. Entries were judged by three jury members, each with extensive experience in the art and design industry. Christol Connolly, a media contact in the Premier's Office, said the three jury members were looking for "someone spirited and youthful" when choosing the winning designs.

Chu said he tried to "incorporate Ontario elements like the triple maple leaf" into his design. Because the medal was intended to be given to students aged 15 to 24, Chu did not want the medal to be too childlike, but to "reflect leadership and inspiration," he added.

The medal is an award for young people who have made volunteer contributions to their communities.

Chu employed computer skills he acquired as a freelance artist to create the design. He was also assisted by his experience as a graphic artist for the CTV Television Network and a graphic designer involved with the creation of advertisements and pamphlets for small businesses.

Upon graduation from Queen's, Chu said he hopes to attend college, where he will gain the practical experience he will need to pursue a career in computer animation and graphics.

The winning design of the contest was conceived by Jolene MacDonald, a third-year student in the Graphic and Advertising program at Conestoga College. MacDonald was awarded a plaque and $2,500. Matthew Donovan, a student at the Ontario College of Art and Design in Toronto, and Chris Joseph Lange, a student at Humber College in Toronto, was also granted honorable mentions for their contributions.

Report 'very important' to school search

"You have to wonder what would happen if our students weren't so great... It has interesting implications for the administration."

"It bothers me, too," said Principal Bill Leggett of the

"I'm disappointed to see that we've slipped."

— Principal Bill Leggett

change in reputation ranking. "I'm disappointed to see that we've slipped," he said, adding, "the comfort I would give students is that the people hiring are much more sophisticated in evaluating the quality of the students coming to them than just looking at a Maclean's ranking."

Overall Leggett said he was "very pleased" with the university report, especially with the recognition given to Queen's effort in the area of scholarship and bursaries. "We've worked very hard," he said, explaining that it is in the long-term vision of the administration to become Canada's first university to institute a "needs-blind" admission process, where students are accepted without reference to their financial situation. Successful applicants are guaranteed financial assistance based on their demonstrated need.

Leggett said there "is a message in [the reputation ranking] for us that we have to work more effectively... to communicate the value of a Queen's degree."

"There are two realities out there," he continued, "what the statistics are, and what people think they mean."

Both Leggett and Dean of Student Affairs Bob Crawford pointed to a recent public relations and fund-raising campaign by the University of Toronto as a possible cause for the change in reputation standing. Queen's is planning to undertake a similar campaign in the upcoming months, Leggett explained.

Another concern to current and future students was the size of first and second-year courses relative to other universities, and the low proportion of those courses (36.6 per cent) taught by tenured faculty.

"What generates [the low percentage of courses taught by tenured faculty] is the very high number of music and language courses," said Leggett. Most instructional music courses are taught by non-tenured music teachers who come in for personal instruction of music students, he explained. Even though those courses only have one student in them, they are each statistically considered a "section" of a course. Thus, from individual music instruction alone there are 79 sections.

If you take out music and language courses, which are similarly taught, the proportion of classes taught by tenured faculty jumps to 63 per cent. "That explains it, [but] I'm not sure it satisfies me," said Leggett, who plans to meet with the vice-principals of the university to discuss the issue.

The importance of the Maclean's ranking is underscored by the number of incoming students who use the magazine as an informational tool in choosing a university.

In a recent survey of first-year students completed by a group of 13 universities called the Canadian Undergraduate Survey Consortium, students were asked which sources of information were most important to them when they were choosing a post-secondary institution.

Overall, 14.6 per cent of students rated the Maclean's university ranking as "very important." In the Queen's group alone, the percentage ranking Maclean's as "very important" jumped to 34.9 per cent, second only to campus visits, 56.4 per cent, as a source of information.

Most first-year Queen's students seem to agree that the annual Maclean's report had some affect on their university choice.

"I looked through it and compared all the aspects," said Veronica Solimano, ArtSci '02. "I was useful because it told me how other people viewed [Queen's]. It gave me a good understanding of what the universities are really like."

"It just gave me a basic understanding of the universities," said first-year life science student Paul Kim. "It had somewhat of an influence, but not a lot, not a great deal."

Recruiters support decision

to a number of lawyers," added Anger.

Irene Bujara, director of the HRO, said some Commerce students last year asked her advice on the issue. "Our advice was very strongly in the vein that there could be potentially seriously consequences legally," to include photos in the resumé books, Bujara said.

Bujara is pleased with the decision. "I think it's a very good idea to remove the photos simply because it's a resumé book and having photos in it unfortunately contributes to a roundabout way of giving employers information they are not technically allowed to ask," Bujara said.

"I think it's the right decision for the school to make in this case," Anger said. "It certainly gives us an opportunity to revamp and revise the resumé book."

Robert Knox and Nicole Aumell, co-chairs of the EIC, brought the issue back to light in September. "This was a big issue last year and it was left to a certain extent unresolved," said Knox.

"The undergraduate office was always concerned with what was best for students," he added.

Knox said the fact that this was a human rights issue was the critical factor in the committee's decision not to put the question to a referendum. "Our background is one of democratic processes," Knox said, however, "definitionally, human rights can't operate that way."

Knox said the committee felt it was important to look at "the legal facts, the implications and the potential ramifications," of the inclusion of photos while paying particular attention to corporate recruiters and the OHRC.

"There was concern that recruiters wouldn't use the book any more," Knox said, however, "it turned out that concern just wasn't accurate."

The EIC surveyed the recruiting contacts in companies which recruit Queen's Commerce students. Of the 24 respondents, 21 indicated that they use the resumé books in their recruiting process. When asked if they would continue to use the books if the students' photos were removed, 100 per cent of these companies stated they would.

"I think it's the right decision for the school to make in this case. It certainly gives us an opportunity to revamp and revise the resumé book."

— Tom Anger, chair of the Commerce program

According to Knox, many company contacts also stated they were uncomfortable with the inclusion of photos in the books because it could lead to human rights complaints and/or violations. Some companies stated that their human resource departments cut or blacked out the photos from the books before they were handed to company recruiters, he added.

"It leaves companies vulnerable to human rights complaints in which case the onus would be on them to disprove the allegation," Knox said. "That's an unfair risk in which to place employers."

In a letter to Commerce students prepared by Knox and Aumell, the co-chairpersons stated that "the inclusion of students' photographs in the resumé book clearly violates the spirit of the OHRC and facilitates unfair discrimination against Queen's Commerce students in their search for employment."

Although the issue directly affects the Comm '00 class and those to follow, Aumell said the decision also affects the Comm '99 class, Queen's Commerce alumni and applicants to the program, as it impacts on "the reputation of the School of Business."

Knox said the photos offer some benefits. These include adding aesthetic value and personality to the resumé books, and helping recruiters identify students at information sessions. However, Knox stated, "You weigh the harms and risks against the benefits and it's a tough argument to disprove."

The decision to support the removal of photos from the resumé books was unanimous between the chairpersons and the five members of the committee. "The facts are really compelling," Knox said. "Across the board, it's a win-win, win-win situation," for students, employers, the School of Business and the university, he added.

In order to diminish the need for the photos, the Commerce Career Centre has introduced student name tags for use at info sessions and the EIC will be introducing business cards for third and fourth year students beginning next fall.

"The book is going to be [professionally] redesigned and students are going to have input into how it's going to be designed," Aumell said.

Options available

ing of the degree. That's what people are concerned about."

"Other universities, such as York, Concordia, Western and McMaster have alternate degree nomenclature available as an option to their graduate students," Sadler stated in the letter.

York University confirmed the terms that are available to their graduate students for Masters degrees are "Master" or "Magisteriate."

Concordia University also confirmed the option is available there, although according to Yvonne Callaway-Smith, who has taught at Concordia, "The university doesn't seem to advertise [the option]."

Cheri Anderson, the class manager for the executive MBA program office at UWO stated, "At present, UWO graduate degrees do not have the option for a gender neutral title."

Western does, however, have a gender-neutral name as an option for their undergraduate degree. Undergraduates can either have "Bachelor" or "Baccalaureate" as the title of their degree.

McMaster University does not have a gender neutral name as an option for its Masters degree at this time either. Denise Anderson, McMaster's manager of recruiting and admissions wrote, "We don't have a gender neutral name for the title of our degree. It's still called Master of Business Administration."

Projects established in Wilson's memory

By CRYSTAL BONA

A group of Mark Wilson's friends have proposed three projects at Queen's to commemorate the fourth-year student's tragic death this summer, and to raise campus awareness about drinking and driving. Mark was a political studies and geography major who was killed with his family July 12 when they were struck by a drunk driver.

The first project, a drinking and driving awareness campaign, is currently in effect. For this event, green ribbons are being distributed on campus for the next few weeks leading up to the holidays. The aim of the program is to increase awareness of the issue, particularly for the holiday season.

"In terms of drinking and driving, we believe this is something really important to do because there's a void to be filled on campus in terms of this issue," said Anatole Papadopoulos, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society president and member of the initiative group. "If you look at statistics, the problem affects a lot of people, but it's not talked about very much," he added.

Although Papadopoulos is affiliated with ASUS, this is not an ASUS endeavour, he explained.

"It would be appropriate to have an award in his name which recognizes extracurricular contribution because Mark was so involved."

— Anatole Popodopoulos, ASUS president

As a second project, the group is also trying to rename an ASUS award for outstanding extracurricular contributions in Mark's honour. Mark was actively involved in extracurricular activities at Queen's, and served as both ASUS representative to the Alma Mater Society and secretary for the ArtSci '99 year society. He was also involved with Departmental Student Council, the PC party and Campus Crusade for Christ.

"It would be appropriate to have an award in his name which recognizes extracurricular contribution because Mark was so involved," said Papadopoulos.

Finally, the group is also trying to establish a memorial park bench in memory of Mark, to be placed on Queen's campus. Fund-raising efforts for this project are in the works.

Queen's student sings praises of Quebec unity

By JOSHUA WIESENTHAL

A song written by Queen's student Marty Silverstone and his long-time friend Jon Small has recently received considerable attention from politicians in Quebec.

"False Frontiers," a pro-Canadian unity song, was named by the Liberal party and was the unofficial 1997 federal election rally theme song. According to Silverstone, Jean Charest, the Liberal candidate, suggested "the song 'False Frontiers'... be taken into consideration for the next provincial election in Quebec."

The MPP for Silverstone's riding said he is not certain whether the party was going to adopt the politically motivated song.

"It is practically impossible to escape the unity debate when you live in Montreal," said Silverstone. He described being so over-saturated with Quebec politics, that the issues "become part of your daily routine."

"The song has received considerable airplay on French university [radio] stations and has started to appear on [Queen's] campus radio," Silverstone added.

The two-person band, Job, pronounced like the biblical Job, derives its meaning from the Old Testament. Silverstone described the story as a man who lived according to his ideals, but experienced "just absolute hell."

"Job would ask questions but could not understand his destiny. He admirably kept everything in perspective, and maintained his faith in God, and in the end, obtained some sense of realization and completeness," Silverstone said.

Marty Silverstone, "mixing politics and songs..."

Silverstone and Small, both 21, are finishing their last year of psychology degrees at Queen's and McGill Universities respectively. Upon graduation, they hope to sign a record contract and begin their professional musical careers.

"On one hand, mixing politics and songs might hinder our chances at professional musical careers. However, using politics can also work as a platform for making our music heard," Silverstone said.

"The song was originally written about reconciling a sour romantic relationship, but was later recognized by Jon as parallel to the Quebec separation issue," Silverstone explained.

The English lyrics include phrases like: "The ego is gone and the heart is back/ Seems that we're miles apart/ I tell you now we're one strong land."

With the exception of one French line, "False Frontiers" is written entirely in English. Silverstone said he and Small are willing to increase the song's French content with some assistance in the translation process.

Small and Silverstone enjoy a long personal and musical history.

Silverstone described his relationship with Small as "a deep friendship. We see eye-to-eye both spiritually and philosophically. Ever since high school, we have been playing and writing together, albeit in different bands."

Although they find it difficult to compare themselves with other musical groups, their style is similar to that of the Indigo Girls, Blue Rodeo and Bob Dylan. Silverstone remarked that "the essence of Job is the duality between friendship and common piece of mind. The songs are all lyrically driven."

Got the blues?

By RENEE HUANG

With the year's first snowfall comes the knowledge that a cold and bitter winter is soon approaching, one that will be yet another terrible ordeal for people living on the streets.

Three Queen's students have organized next week's "Lose your Blues" clothing drive in hopes of making a positive impact on poverty issues in Kingston.

Lauten Sukerman, Arts '00, Michelle Donnelly, Arts '99, and Karen Hindle, Arts '01 are the deputy commissioners for the AMS Social Issues Committee responsible for organizing the week-long event.

Starting Monday, students may bring used jeans and other clothes to the upper ceiling in the JDUC. The items will later be donated to the Free Clothing Drop-In and Textile Recycling Centre in Kingston.

Deputies are required to coordinate projects and initiatives that are both beneficial to the Queen's community and support the work of their commission. This year, Sukerman, Donnelly and Hindle are joining forces to tackle the issue of homelessness.

"It turned out that what we were thinking of was the same," said Sukerman. "Basically [homelessness] is a serious problem that can't be ignored."

"Particularly here in Kingston and Queen's, it's not an issue people focus on," agreed Donnelly. "It's an area of affluence... I don't think people think it's a problem here."

Sukerman said they focused their project on gathering clothes for the homeless because essential items necessary for survival in the harsh Kingston climate are scarce.

Hindle is from Montreal, where a man known as "Le Bon Homme dans la Rue" started a similar campaign to help battle homelessness, Sukerman said, setting up a shelter and organizing volunteers to dispense blankets to the homeless. "That's the model we're using," she said.

"We want to make people aware of issues on campus and in the community," contended Donnelly. She said the group wanted to focus on a less prominent issue at Queen's.

"There seems to be a focus on gender issues, sexism, racism and we don't seem to deal with campus issues like soup kitchens," she added.

Sukerman said the campaign name, "Lose your Blues", contains "a double meaning of losing your sadness. By giving things away, you feel better." People receiving the gifts also gain in knowing that members of the community are concerned for their welfare.

MaryLynn Morrison is coordinator of the centre receiving the used clothes from the drive. She is pleased with the initiative Sukerman, Donnelly and Hindle are taking in organizing the campaign.

"It's really nice to see Queen's students take an interest in acting against poverty," Morrison said.

The centre is volunteer based and serves a large clientele in Kingston. An annual membership fee of $2 allows clients to take whenever they want and need free of charge.

"I haven't, as of yet, found a place that is free [in Kingston]," said Morrison. Last year alone, volunteers at the centre saw 6,400 children and 8,000 women and men in the 15 hours a week the centre is open, she said. "This year, we expect the numbers to increase due to government cutbacks."

Clientele range all over the board, according to Morrison. "We do get a mixture of everything and everybody."

Located in the basement of Queen Elizabeth Collegiate and Vocational Institute at 145 Kirkpatrick St., the centre is open Tuesday to Thursday, 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. and can be reached at 549-1348.

Volunteer Opportunities

The Boys Club of Greater Kingston needs youth leaders with CPR and First Aid knowledge to become part of a team to implement programs for children aged four to 18; the Kingston Regional Arts Council needs 100 volunteers to help with New Year's Eve events in downtown Kingston; Fairmount Home needs volunteers to help residents in wheelchairs attend Sunday church services; St. John Ambulance Cadet Division is looking for a volunteer superintendent 18 years of older with Standard First Aid to plan and implement a training schedule for the cadets. Ongwanada needs three volunteer drivers to take clients from Napanee to primarily Kingston for medical appointments and community events. Ryandale House for the Homeless requires 10 volunteer Front-Line Workers 25 years or older to do paperwork, socialize and support guests.

Solicitor-General still in trouble

Solicitor-General Andy Scott is back in hot water this week, as a sworn affidavit by Frederick Toole, the friend who was sitting next to him during the now infamous Air Canada flight, undermined the minister's denials that he did not prejudice the outcome of the APEC inquiry. New Democratic MP Dick Proctor, who overheard the discussion between the pair, believes Mr. Scott said that a handful of RCMP officers used excessive force on student protesters and that Hugh Stewart (the officer seen in television replays pepper-spraying protesters and a cameraman) would be held accountable. Mr. Scott maintains he did nothing wrong.

Bouchard to try again

Lucien Bouchard confirmed he is using the Quebec election campaign to solicit a mandate to hold a winning referendum. Polls show Quebecers are opposed to another secession vote, but Bouchard believes that voters are only opposed to losing another referendum.

Search for Trudeau on hold

Worsening weather and concern for safety was the reason the search for Michel Trudeau's body was suspended Wednesday night. The 23-year old son of former prime minister Pierre Trudeau drowned in Kokanee Lake in southeastern B.C. last Friday, shortly before the lake began to freeze over. "The overall risk outweighs any benefits when you factor in all the evidence, from the thinness of the ice, to continued avalanche danger in the area," said Cpl. Koch of the RCMP. This decision likely means that the search will be suspended until spring, when the ice begins to melt.

On Dealing with Persistent Disturbances in Control and Signal Processing
Daniel Miller, Associate Professor, Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering, University of Waterloo

Abstract

In H-infinity optimal control and filter design, the energy norm is used to measure the size of a signal; the design process involves shaping the frequency response of the appropriate transfer function, and the (near) optimal controller or filter can be obtained by solving several Riccati equations. In many situations, however, the disturbance and/or reference signal is persistent, so a more natural measure of signal size is the infinity norm, which is simply the maximum size of the signal. In this talk this approach will be explored via a simple example, and it will be explained how linear programming can be used to solve the design problem. Properties of the solution will be compared with those of the solution obtained via the H-infinity design approach. The talk will conclude with a brief discussion of the design of nonlinear optimal controllers, which is a present topic of research.

Ad campaign unfair

A RECENT SPATE OF TELEVISION advertising by the Ontario government is bent on convincing us that changes to health-care in Ontario are in our best interests. Mike Harris is your friend. By using slick advertising, they are trying to plant the idea in voters' heads that the benefits of closing hospitals and slashing health-care budgets outweigh any temporary "inconveniences." Mike Harris is your friend. At the same time, however, the Progressive Conservative party is airing American-style ads that question opposition leader Dalton McGuinty's stand on these same issues. Mike Harris is someone's friend.

Equally disturbing as the timing of these taxpayer-funded ads is the heart-tugging effect they evoke.

It seems particularly insidious of the government to use taxpayers' money to praise their health-care reforms and begin campaigning for the next election at the same time. Mike Harris is someone's friend. Also, since only the Conservatives know exactly when the election will be held, it is an unfair advantage and an abuse of the electoral system for them to begin campaigning now. Mike Harris may be your friend.

Equally disturbing as the timing of these taxpayer-funded ads is the heart-tugging effect they evoke. When the little boy in the commercial rips off his bandage, an action that is supposed to symbolize the temporary pain of health-care reform, the viewer is either moved to sympathy for the government or put off by the obvious appeal to sentimentality. Mike Harris may not be your friend. These commercials are cleverly constructed, but do they actually inform the public of anything important?

While not illegal, this pre-emptive campaigning by the Conservatives is hardly fair to the opposition parties or the public who must pay for it. Mike Harris is no one's friend.

Rebirth of the CFL

WHEN THE 86TH ANNUAL GREY Cup kicks off on Sunday, the Hamilton Tiger-Cats are going to buck the odds and "stamp" all over Calgary. Despite disappointing ticket sales for the event, there is a palpable feeling of excitement over the rejuvenation of the CFL this year that will culminate with the Grey Cup game. Back in the big game after a nine year hiatus, the Ticats seem to embody the image of an underdog league that through humility and determination has survived waning interest and near-bankruptcy.

When the Ticats trounce the Stampeders (sorry, no spread provided), the eyes of the nation will be tuned to a great Canadian tradition that has stayed true to the spirit of sport and not succumbed to the temptation of big-bucks that has tainted much of the professional sports world.

This resurgence of spirit and health in the CFL can in part be attributed to the realization by the league that they are not competing with the NFL. The decision to accept a multi-million dollar loan from the NFL in exchange for player signing-rights signals a positive change in attitude towards the U.S.

With the last of the superstars, Doug Flutie, gone to the NFL, the league is finally benefiting from parity among teams. The fans' positive response to the more equitable level of competition in the CFL seems to prove that less

When the Ticats trounce the Stampeders, the eyes of the nation will be tuned to a great Canadian tradition.

American-style football does not equal mediocre or unexciting football. In fact, when spectators tune in for the Grey Cup on Sunday, it will be with the expectation that, unlike the usually boring and staid Superbowl, they will watch the most exciting game of the year. Go Ticats!

The season of giving

AS THE CHRISTMAS SEASON NEARS once again, I find myself, as always, curious about the inundation of capitalistic seasonal images our society welcomes. Along with the arrival of Santa Claus in the parade last Sunday came the official start of open season for Kingston shoppers. As a part-time retail sales associate, I witness first hand the gleam in shopper's eyes as the cornucopia of Christmas paraphernalia is unveiled. Ribbons, lights, plastic trees and styrofoam candies thickly coated with glitter grace the walkways, windows and stores.

I am confident that I do not suffer this affliction of seasonal nausea alone.

When Christmas songs blaring in their ears, shoppers are mindlessly sucked into the pride and joy of credit card corporations. While I will admit to being enthusiastic about the first few days of hearing Madonna's "Santa Baby" playing over our store's stereo, I also recognize the inherent disgrace the song bestows on the principle of Christmas. I often wonder, though, how many of the shoppers amongst the glittering displays also recognize this. Madonna's girlish squeals requesting to be showered with diamond rings and tree trimmings bought at Tiffany's are, I'll admit, catchy, but also troublesome.

Are images of jewelry, toys, clothes and electronics all we envision when we reflect on Christmas? Where has the culture gone? Where has the morality gone? I am confident that I do not suffer this affliction of seasonal nausea alone. To those of you who have not given the issue much contemplation, however, I ask you to ponder this phenomenon. Are you allowing yourself to be drawn into the reprehensible world of excessive commercialism? It is a wonderful experience to exchange gifts with friends and love ones, but we can not expect complete satisfaction unless we accompany those events with activities which engage our minds and our consciences.

When you find yourself dragging through the pre-holiday season wondering how much further you can go before your credit card is declined, why not regroup? Take a moment to grasp the idea behind the image. Christmas is about giving, but unfortunately that ideal has been grossly manipulated in our society. The story goes, in Christian ideology, that God gave the greatest gift imaginable to the world, his only son. In comparison, mercantile glitz and glam can hardly bear weight. No matter what cultural beliefs you espouse, the holiday season is an opportunity to share something of yourself with the people you love. So give your gifts and have your feasts, but, most importantly, talk, share and enjoy. Take a break from the mindless monotony of mercantilism and ponder the essentialist notion of giving.

Pros of rights for cons

Judging our society by the way we deal with criminals

IMAGINE A CITY of 300 people ruled by an authoritative administration that determines what you eat, whom you speak to, what you read and where you work. You have no privacy, not even when you use the toilet or take a shower. You wear only what is sanctioned and you buy only what they authorize. You must even have permission to move around. Any disobedience can result in forced solitary confinement, where every moment seems endless.

"Who ever heard of rights for prisoners?" my friend asked. "Criminals forfeited their rights when they were placed behind bars." I disagree to a certain extent.

This "imaginary" city exists. I volunteer there every Friday.

Incarceration means living under severely restrictive conditions, living a schedule which includes a counting of prisoners in their cells at least twice a day. Varying degrees of security exist and, consequently, there are varying degrees of tension. Work opportunities exist (federal offenders can earn up to $6.90 a day), as does the possibility of educational training. Recreational activities are present in some form, as are visiting rights including conjugal visits. However, these are always subject to cancellation by prison authorities who keep a detailed record of the inmate's conduct.

Our penitentiaries exist for three reasons: to deter crime from happening, to punish the criminals that get caught and to rehabilitate convicts. Convicts do have some limited rights.

"Who ever heard of rights for prisoners?" my friend said. "Criminals forfeited their rights when they were placed behind bars."

I disagree to a certain extent. Some rights should be given to prisoners, but they have to assume responsibility for those rights. Do prisoners want to be treated like human beings? If so, they will have to treat fellow inmates and institution staff like human beings. Rights and responsibilities go hand in hand.

For instance, if an inmate knows someone who is planning to escape or "go over" the wall, that person should try to talk them out of it. Maybe they should say, "Don't screw the administration because then you'll be screwing me." Once a convict has a stake in the future and can see the benefits, it is quite natural that the he or she would feel responsible for another person's actions. If some prisoners started a fight over something trivial, then certain rights should be taken away for all.

Prisoners rights should be an issue for Kingston. Thousands of people in this city depend on the penitentiary system for employment. At least 10 prisons are located in the Kingston area. If any city should be concerned with the treatment of prisoners, it should be Kingston.

Do prisoners want to be treated like human beings? If so, they will have to treat inmates and institution staff like human beings. Rights and responsibilities go hand in hand.

Fifty years ago, Winston Churchill declared that the mood and temper with which the public regards crime and criminals is one of the unfailing tests of the civilization of any country. Judged by this standard, how civilized are we?

Darwin questioned

Dear Editors,

Re: Andrew Parker's "Darwin in the raw"

As a biologist I feel the compelling urge to comment on Andrew Parker's "Darwin in the raw" (The Queen's Journal, 1998.11.13).

The very statement "The theory of evolution... eliminates faith and supposition" shows a lack of understanding of the evolution of the theory of evolution. Darwin's theory was based on several suppositions (e.g. slow changes in biological systems which were selected by the environment).

His formulation was indeed somehow based on evidence, but that was the observable evidence available at the time of the formulation. In other words, Darwin knew nothing of the macromolecular world of the organisms he was deriving from each other, and his evidence was thus flawed (i.e. evidence and truth do not always coincide). Nothing wrong with that, but that is a factor that must be taken into account.

It is no wonder that today's theory of evolution is not a photocopy of Darwin's theory, since the modern theory (still a theory since we haven't observed the formation of a new species yet) based on alterations of the genetic make-up of the biological systems (absent in Darwin's theory), takes into account some form of catastrophism (survival of the luckiest), and some leaps as soon as they were possible (rather than a constant slow accumulation of small changes).

Darwin's formulation was based on the observable evidence of the time. He didn't know about the macromolecular world of the organisms he was deriving from. His evidence was flawed.

Parker's outright condemnation of religious beliefs — "That which causes people to avert their eye from the truth is nothing other than the light of religious faith" — is itself quite far from the Truth. The evidence presented (two ad hoc examples) does not encompass the totality of people's faiths, a totality required by Parker's statement. One single example that contradicts Parker would send his whole statement crumbling. And here is one example: Roman Catholics, among other things, live by what has been formulated as "I believe in order to understand, and I understand in order to better believe." This non-incompatibility between faith and reason was recently the theme of the last papal encyclical. The suggested reading, Richard Dawkins's "The Selfish Gene" (1976), is not a scientific publication, and goes against thermodynamical truths exemplified by the physical impossibility of a primordial soup three billion years ago. May I suggest to substitute that recommended reading with articles in scientific magazines, and look at the theory of a primordial RNA-world?

Remembrance rebuttal

Dear Editors,

I read with considerable interest the soul-searching contribution of Mark Salvador in your issue of 13 November. Mr Salvador is of course entitled to his own version of Remembrance Day and the significance of the poppy. While I don't claim to follow all of his reasoning, I do think he misses the point.

It is more than just a shame that over 100,000 Canadians died fighting this country's wars. Their special contribution to the nation is recognized because the act of deliberately putting one's life at risk for others is different from the cultural issues Mr Salvador speaks about elsewhere in his article. He appears to assert, for example, the equivalence of the heroism and sacrifice of young men in the mud of Flanders with the temporary curtailment of individual liberty - this is simply wrong.

Letters to the Editors

That is not to say that past injustices were excusable. However, by so diluting the meaning of Remembrance Day by incorporating contemporary views of social injustice, we risk losing an important part of our national consciousness.

Lieutenant-Colonel William Peters, Visiting Defence Fellow Centre for International Relations

Dousing The Waterboy

Dear Editors,

Okay, okay, Jeff Child's witty, amusing review of The Waterboy was exactly that — witty and amusing. And far be it from me to pick on a good review of a hilarious movie. However, a couple of comments in it really ticked me off. It's the part of the article where Jeff discusses Adam Sandler's transformation from a waterboy to a football player. Jeff says: "So, Bobby becomes an overly aggressive, uneducated U.S. College football player. Yehaa! So far this sounds like a biography of the entire NCAA athletic alumni."

Whoa, Jeff. Easy there. Here's a different perspective:

I am a proud Canadian who was raised in the Southern U.S., in the heart of football country. And several of my friends are now playing NCAA Division-1 football. I understand that people may have the mistaken, uninformed impression that the entire NCAA is full of oafish, overgrown, "let's crash beer cans against our heads and tip over small cars for fun" kind of guys who got into university based on the size of their biceps, not the size of their IQ.

I'll give you my personal viewpoint on this. One of the most important people in my life is an NCAA Division-1 football player. Yeah, he's able to withstand three 250-pound guys pummeling him and he can pretty much crush anything in his path. "Overly aggressive" and "uneducated"? Au contraire, my friend. He has a 90% average and would never lay a hand on anyone (off the football field) except to be affectionate. And as for all NCAA athletes being "overly aggressive"? Nah. They're only "overly aggressive" to people wearing the wrong uniform in a game. Isn't that "aggressiveness" why they were chosen to play at the NCAA level?

People may have the mistaken impression that the NCAA is full of oafish guys that got into university because of their biceps, not their IQ.

The perception that NCAA athletes are "uneducated" is inaccurate as well. Sure, I can see that some are in university simply because they squeaked by on their college entrance exams and can rush for 1,000-plus yards per season. However, the mere fact that they are in college implies that they are getting a higher education (even if for some it is in basket weaving). Some people are at Queen's because they squeaked by in their OAC year and Mommy and Daddy went here. What's the difference?

It might appear to some that NCAA football players get special treatment and decreased academic standards. Trust me, that is not the case for the vast majority of college athletes, and it's a shame that assumption taints the whole NCAA. Most are hardworking students like you and me. Try to imagine balancing four hours of football practice a day, studying, cross-country road trips, maintaining relationships... and you might find a newfound respect for these guys. The NCAA football players that I went to school with had SAT score averages above 1100 (the average is 900, Harvard, Yale, and Queen's like scores above 1200) and made Honours when they graduated.

Another thing: saying that it "...sounds like a biography of the entire NCAA alumni" includes swimming, lacrosse, soccer, baseball, basketball, and all other NCAA sports. That generalization also includes female athletes. I am not even going to go there.

I'll throw this in just for fun—I lived in the South for eleven years. Not once have I heard someone yell "YEEHAAA!" not even from guys named Bubba who hang out of their pickups with the rebel flag flying from the antenna. And yes, these guys do exist. Trust me.

Bottom Line: I liked the article didn't like the stereotypes.

Sincerely,
Chelsea Groux-Rocklein

Poppy pride

Dear Editors,

In the spirit of remembrance broached by Mr. Salvador, there are a number of things of which I would like to remind him. Although his article is distinctly lacking in any specific grievances, I must assume he is referring to the internment of Canadian Japanese by our government during World War II. This was not carried out by the veterans of World War II, nor the other wars that we stop to remember on November 11. Mr. Salvador's suggestion that the memory of these veterans is disgraced by injustices committed here in Canada while they were dying in far away lands is ridiculous. That he would even suggest a link in this time of mourning shows a distinct lack of taste.

Letters to the Editors

There is a time and a place for everything. This is not a time to complain about mistakes made by government a half-century ago. Remember their suffering, but do not point fingers.

Remembrance Day is supposed to be a time when we remember our dead. That is why I wear my poppy.

Where are our priorities?

Dear Editors,

The obsession of the 'brains,' in the media and government, of the world's most powerful nation, and the never ending legal gobbledygook, if somebody suffered severe trauma from being propositioned, and if two consenting adults had obviously some mutual satisfaction, while getting ready to sacrifice Iraq's lives, is utterly ridiculous.

I deplore the USA's readiness to bomb Iraq. Thousands of already suffering human beings will die, while Hussein is safe.

If it weren't for a power struggle, the lawyers and the prospect of big money making, a mature woman would have simply laughed at an unsolicited proposition. And lovers would never tell. However I must deplore the USA's readiness, to bomb the hell out of Iraq, as a criminal act against humanity. With this monstrous arsenal of weapons thousands of already suffering human beings will lose their lives, while Saddam Hussein is safe.

Adding to this comes the senseless destruction of nonrenewable resources, which will add plenty of greenhouse gases.

If there exists honest interest in world peace, Clinton, Hussein and a few more heads of state should be persuaded to meet in a neutral country for a 'round the clock' worldwide televised symposium, for which I can supply some good ideas.

If this cannot be done, than I must assume that O.J. Simpson and Monica Lewinsky is more important.

Gunther Ostermann,
Kingston resident

Dear Editors,

We were gratified to see your recent coverage of speaker Herb Goldstein and Holocaust Education week. However, as students who attended this lecture, we were somewhat put off by the behaviour of your photographer. We understand that he must have needed several shots from various locations in order to ensure a satisfactory result. However, he was quite conspicuous in accomplishing this, getting up several times during the presentation, blocking the views of others and snapping pictures quite loudly and obtrusively. Especially considering the serious subject being addressed, greater care could have been used to ensure minimal disturbance. No doubt, had your photographer approached Mr. Goldstein at the end of the lecture, he would have happily posed for photographs. Alternately, the photographer could have waited to snap his pictures until the end of the talk. While we applaud the Journal's interest in a wide variety of campus events and activities, we hope that in the future, this interest will not infringe on the ability of others to enjoy the events you cover.

Honduran nightmare

Letter to the Editors,

Two weeks ago Central America was ravaged by a hurricane the likes of which has never before been felt on this continent. As the damages from Hurricane Mitch are being assessed, a cold new reality is dawning on this developing world. The president of Honduras, Carlos Roberto Flores, estimates that the destruction to his country has set back development efforts twenty-five years. Echoes of Mitch will be felt for decades to come.

The president of Honduras estimates that the destruction of his country has set back development twenty-five years.

The bright light shining on Honduras through this critical point has been the outpouring of international support. Desperately needed financial and technical assistance was quick in response to the immediate needs. The challenge will be sustaining this aid over the longer term rebuilding the shattered infrastructure, crippled agriculture sector, and a cultural confidence paralyzed by devastation.

As a foreigner working directly with the disaster relief efforts in Tegucigalpa, Honduras I would like to send an urgent plea for the continued solidarity of the international community.

I offer the following suggestions for channeling your support:

Letters...

Perhaps the best of Mr. Kaminsky's point is that higher education should be reserved for the intellectually elite. It is clear that today, everyone must attend a post-secondary institution of some sort to have any real chance of a job. What has happened is that everyone is attending university. As a result, it has lost its status as the highest level of education. As Maclean's points out, many top-notch High School students are turning to colleges as a viable alternative.

I propose instead that we limit enrollment by raising the bar across the province for University admission. An average below eighty percent should preclude anyone from gaining entrance to the traditional programmes at every university. Specialized programs which rely less on marks than on other factors (such as Applied Arts) should remain exempt, but if one wishes to study English anywhere in Ontario, they should require a mark of 80 per cent.

This will accomplish a number of things. First of all, it will limit the amount of people who get degrees. If less people can say they have degrees, it helps to restore the value of the degree (simple supply and demand economics). Secondly, it will raise the quality of all universities, because everyone will have achieved a base of 80 per cent.

Different schools can fluctuate the admission average above 80 (ie. Queen's could say 87, while Western could say 85). Third, it will cause a shortage of students for some universities that are not providing top-notch programmes.

This brings us to Mr. Kaminsky's point about closing schools. The major flaw in his argument is that there would be an overflow of surplus students from closed schools to others, so schools would simply increase in numbers. But there would be the same number of students, and hence the same cost involved per student. Mr. Fullerton accurately points out that the cost of administration is negligible. But if fewer students were permitted to attend university, the inferior schools would close on their own; we wouldn't close them due to demographics or proximity to other schools. The better schools would survive, with the same number of students. The students would just be of a higher caliber. Quality would improve across the board, because the schools with the best programmes would survive, and as such a degree would be harder to get once you got to university too.

The only way to achieve this is to set up provincial standards for OAC (soon to be Grade 12) marks. One test in core subjects such as Math or English, across the province. I believe that there should be a fundamental minimum ALL students coming to University should know; province wide tests would eliminate some frosh who don't know what a thesis is (they're out there, trust me.)

There is an argument that a lot of good students who didn't make the 80 per cent minimum would be lost. However, I am sure that if High School students knew they needed an 80 to get into University, they would get it. And province-wide testing, with marking done by impartial teachers (like in England) would eliminate favoritism.

There is an argument that academics aren't everything, and I accept this. We already place an emphasis on extra-curricular activity. All we would be doing is raising the bar, which is currently too low in my opinion. For students who didn't get the 80, there would be other ways to get to university, such as mature student application or part-time studies to prove they belong in university. The real problem is there are too many university graduates, and not enough jobs.

Money would also be saved this way, since less students would mean less cost. We have to make a university degree count for something again, and the only way to do this is to shorten the supply of those who have one, and to give one to those who truly deserve it.

You're white, right? Wrong!

Dear Editors,

When I was a kid, I took piano lessons, ballet, figure skating and went to Brownies and Girl Guides. My childhood pastimes were having my friends over on a Sunday to bake cookies, play dress-up and read 'The Baby-Sitters' Club' books. I speak 'Canadian'. If you didn't see my last name, but read the above description of myself, you would have thought that I was white. WRONG!!! I am of Chinese heritage. My interests growing up were never 'typically Chinese' and almost none of my friends were either.

The two or three that were of Chinese decent all had the same or similar up bringing as myself. O.K. I guess you're wondering 'What's the point of this?' My point is that racism also exists within the same group. When I was in high school, there was this one (Chinese) girl who always asked me why I was so 'white-washed'. What? Just because my friends were mostly white, listen to Sarah McLachlan and that I attended Brownies automatically makes me 'white-washed'? O.K. I have to admit that Chinese parents don't normally send their daughters to Brownies. I have yet to a Brownie unit that has more than five Chinese Brownies!! (I know they're out there, but I have yet to see one)

I also find that self segregation is a major problem here on campus. When I first read the Queen's prospectus brochure last year, I was surprised to find that the minority/cultural clubs were so segregated. In high school, we had one club for all. We didn't have a separate club for Chinese students (several clubs here at Queen's, but that's a whole other story), Japanese students, black students, etc... We had one big club.

I also find that some courses are predominantly this, while other classes are predominantly that. I was surfing around the World Wide Web just the other day and came upon the Chinese Students' Association website. I clicked on the list of members, and my speculation was right.

Most, if not all of the members were either associated with Engineering or science (as in ArtSci). I mean, why is that? Is there something about being Chinese that I don't know about? Like, I have to take something related to the sciences? Is it illegal for me to take voice lessons or women's studies? Oh...I'm sorry, I didn't know that! Please throw me in jail! O.K. I understand that you can't really change other people's interests in the various classes they take, but self segregation can stop.

BY RACHEL FRIESEN

The 1998 Canadian Undergraduate Physics Conference was held here at Queen's last weekend for the second time since the annual conference first began in 1965. While this may not sound earth-shaking to some, the conference serves as an opportunity for undergraduate physics students across the country to interact with and learn from each other, as well as meet and listen to established physicists and representatives from physics-related industries.

Art McDonald, Queen's professor and director of the Sudbury Neutrino Observatory, spoke at the opening reception Thursday morning and, in the afternoon, the delegates had the chance to tour several facilities dedicated to ongoing physical research. This included road trips to the National Research Council in Ottawa, the Darlington Nuclear Reactor and a tour of points of interest in and around Kingston. The evening gave the delegates a more intimate knowledge of Kingston, when they went on a pub or café crawl, according to their tastes.

Nobel laureate (1997, physics) William Phillips provided all participants in the conference a reason to wake up early Friday morning when he gave his talk, entitled "Almost Absolute Zero: The Story of Laser Cooling and Trapping." He described the history of the effort to slow atoms down by lowering their temperature to just nanoKelvins above absolute zero. Applications of this research include extremely accurate atomic clocks, to be used for navigation and communication, as well as the furthering of knowledge of fundamental physics.

The next lecture, by Jim Peebles, a prominent astrophysicist and cosmologist from Princeton University, focused on the dispersion of matter in the universe and how this relates to theories concerning its origins and fate. The distribution of matter is important to these theories. If it is below a certain critical density then the universe will continue to expand indefinitely. If it is above, the universe will eventually stop expanding and contract in what physicists describe as 'the Big Crunch.' Current thinking is that the density is low, but research in the field is ongoing, and Peebles' talk elicited many interesting questions about the nature of the universe.

Lecture by Sir Denys Wilkinson, Friday, November 27, 8:00 p.m. Stirling D. Topic: Is there a Grand Design that shaped the universe of which we are the beneficiaries?

Nobel laureate William Phillips provided all participants in the conference a reason to wake up early Friday morning.

In the evening, Dave Rogers, who works with the National Research Council, gave a talk on the improvement of cancer care by using computers to simulate the transport of ionizing radiation. He described the applications of the principles of physics to the practice of medicine, in particular discussing radiotherapy, diagnostic radiology and nuclear medicine. The objective of running these simulations is to be better able to maximize a dose of radiation to a tumour while minimizing the dose to healthy tissue, which is a critical concern in cancer care. Rogers showed how computer programs are used to measure doses more accurately, improving radiotherapy.

The remaining speakers gave their talks on Saturday, beginning with Michael Duff and his lecture on M-theory, a new model of the universe in 11 dimensions. This talk described the current thinking in physics on the necessary characteristics of a unified theory of physical phenomena, sometimes called the "Theory of Everything," and how M-theory would satisfy those conditions. Although imagining space in 11 dimensions is very difficult, if not nearly impossible, Duff explained the theory in easily understandable terms.

Also speaking on Saturday was Chris Backhouse of the Alberta Micro-electronic Corporation, who gave a lecture on micromachining relative to the life sciences. The use of technology on a very small scale to separate and combine particles and fluids has led to advances in combinatorial chemistry, with potential applications ranging from in vitro fertilization to petroleum extraction.

Between lectures by the guest speakers, upper-year delegates had the opportunity to speak on the area of research they are pursuing themselves. On Saturday, other delegates were able to put up posters describing their research and these. Topics covered a wide range of physical phenomena, covering many different applications of physics.

Concluding the conference was Marc Abrahams, the editor of the international science humour magazine, the Annals of Improbable Research. AIR publishes scientific articles which are definitely off the beaten path. Abrahams' slide show at the closing banquet featured many of AIR's recent stories and some of the winners of the prestigious Ig Nobel awards for research "that can not or should not be reproduced." Abrahams provided a refreshing — if somewhat eccentric — end to the conference.

First phase of space station launched this morning

NASA GRAPHIC

If all went according to plans, the first component of the new International Space Station was launched aboard a Proton rocket from Kazakhstan this morning. The Russian-built control module, called Zarya — the Russian word for "sunrise" — will be the initial power source for the rest of the station. The next phase of the ISS construction, a collaborative effort among 16 countries, will involve a space shuttle launch on December 3. Endeavour's six-person crew will attach the next section of the station, a hexagonal connecting module called Unity.

The ion drive 'as shut down, Cap'n!

The experimental ion drive engine on NASA's Deep Space 1 probe failed minutes after ground controllers switched it on last week. DS1 is scheduled to reach asteroid 1992 KD by July, which will be impossible if the solar-powered charged-particle propulsion system can't be restarted.

Leonid 'storm' barely a drizzle

If you didn't drag your ass out of bed early Wednesday morning and go out into the cold to watch "the astronomical spectacle of a lifetime," don't worry about it. The anticipated Leonid meteor storm, predicted to have reached peak intensity this past week, wasn't much more than a sprinkle. The show was disappointing even in Mongolia, on the "right" side of the Earth for the display. Canadian sky watchers had set up an observatory there to monitor meteor activity and were expecting up to 10,000 fireballs per hour. The actual rate was only about 50 visible meteors per hour. The Leonids didn't cause the havoc on communication systems that was expected, either. Indeed, some of the satellite operators that shut down their space craft and turned them away from the meteor stream are probably wondering what all the fuss was about. Still, a few pretty spectacular meteors did appear to a squadron of The Journal's paintball guerrillas on training exercises at an undisclosed location north of Kingston. More than just white streaks, like August's Perseid meteors, a couple of the Leonids were fireballs in orange and green, fading slowly in the sky.

Grok: A Science Opinion

SCIENCE IS MORE THAN COLLECTING THE data, crunching the numbers and blasting your conclusion from last year's cooks. The issues that crop up in science, medicine and technology are among the most hotly debated these days. Is it safe to drink the milk? Are soft PVC baby toys really that dangerous? Is everybody going just a little bit nuts over this Year 2000 thing?

That's where Grok comes in. This will be a regular part of Science featuring your opinions on scientific issues.

But what in the name of Schrödinger's cat is a Grok? Wired magazine says that "grok" is "a verb meaning to scan all available information regarding a situation, digest it, and form a distilled opinion." Of course, such an incredibly useful word could only come from the mind of a science-fiction author. Robert A. Heinlein coined the word in Stranger in a Strange Land and other authors, such as Tom Wolfe and Spider Robinson, have used it in their own stories.

So, grok your lectures, grok the news. Hell, grok the latest episode of The X-Files. And write a Grok.

Two Queen's students brave Wednesday morning's cold to catch a glimpse of the Leonid meteor shower. The clear skies offered an excellent view of the few meteors that did appear. See "Leonid," right.

A brief history of words

In looking at the history of the word "vernacular," it becomes apparent that its original meaning was meant to subjugate those who wore its label. Yet, today, as different forms of the vernacular begin to become commonplace in English, the ideological control over language begins to move from the traditional, normative forms of words to the vernacular.

~ Vernacular is a necessary addition to the Keywords of today ~

By MALCOLM LEVY

"We were too preoccupied with this new and strange world around us. Then we both said, in effect simultaneously: 'the fact is, they just don't speak the same language.'"

— RAYMOND WILLIAMS, KEYWORDS

THIS REVELATION MADE BY Raymond Williams after returning to Cambridge from a tour of duty in World War II reflects the basis for his topic of inquiry in his book Keywords, wherein Williams develops an entire new way of looking at the imbedded meanings of words in today's society.

His insight also serves as a springboard into this feature, which is set to examine distinct keywords in the English language under an objective lens in order to create a framework that presents a different view of linguistic history.

Williams began to analyze the available and developing meanings of words. He chose certain "keywords" based upon two critical reasons: "they are specific, binding words in certain activities and their interpretation; (and) they are significant, indicative words in certain forms of thought."

It seems though, that Williams made one glaring omission when he created his list of keywords: the word vernacular.

In discussing the transformation of word meaning, Williams explains how no single group is wrong in their use of the English language. Instead it is the group who is temporarily controlling power within the discourse of language that may enforce its own use as correct.

"What is really happening through these critical encounters, which may be very conscious or may be felt only as a certain strangeness and unease, is a process quite central in the development of a language when, in certain words, tones and rhythms, meanings are offered, felt for, tested, confirmed, qualified, changed."

After making this revelation concerning language development, Williams's omission becomes even more of an anomaly. In the past three hundred years there is hardly any word more appropriate in analyzing forms of thought than vernacular, and it only seems appropriate that this word be submitted in the Keywords of today.

The History of Vernacular quently employed with reference to that of the working class or peasantry." (OED 549) Soon after it was used as a predicate when describing different colonial projects: "The Arab-speaking race, must receive the gospel mainly from those to whom the language is vernacular." (OED 549)

In dealing with literary works, the vernacular work dealt with a book that had been translated into the native language of a particular country or people. Eventually, its use also began to incorporate the dialects developing from a certain language: "The vernacular English, as I have... remarked, was rough and unpolished." (OED 549) In the arts, it began to describe music, art and design that were native or peculiar to a particular country or locality.

This was quite popular "in vernacular architecture, architecture concerned with ordinary domestic and functional buildings rather than the essentially monumental." (OED 549) It also became synonymous with diseases that were characteristic of a particular country or district.

Finally the meanings came to halt with the use of the vernacular to symbolize "a slave: That is born on his master's estate; home born." (OED 549) Its final meaning as an adjective was also its most important, as the word began to take on the semantics of slavery.

As a substantive noun, vernacular was seen as "the native speech or language of a particular country or district, [and] also, the informal, colloquial, or distinctive speech of a people or a group." (OED 549) It quickly evolved from the language of a particular country, and began to deal with words that were associated with a specific group. Such groups include the "feminist vernacular today, and the word personhole cover." (OED 549)

"with hip-hop now readily available for mass-consumption, its effect on language is bananas."

— Editorial from hip-hop mogazine, The Source

There are a plethora of words that find their root in verna. Vernacularism refers to "a vernacular word, idiom, or mode of expression." (OED 549) A Vernaculist is "an advocate of the use of a regional mode of speech." (OED 549) Modern day vernaculists are poets, rap artists and other people who advocate the use of regional speech. Vernacularity occurs in "belonging or adhering to the vernacular of native language (of a specific region)." (OED 550)

The Vernacularization occurs in "the action of making or the fact of being made native to a language." (OED 550) To Vernacularize a word is "to translate the native speech of a people." (OED 550) Vernaculens are the "low bred, scullions (of society). They are indigenous in nature." [OED 550] All these words refer to two specific ideas of verna. First, they refer to the dialects developing from a specific region by a certain group of people. Second, they describe this group as a subservient, lower class within society.

The Vernacular as an Oral Tradition

THE HISTORY OF VERNACULAR SPEECH for African-Americans and Jamaicans began with the European project of colonialism, as language was used as an instrument of cultural erasure and appropriation. The colonisers' language was taught in schools, spoken in the courts, and knowledge of it was a necessary condition for access to positions of power. The syntax and pronunciation of the English dominate classes endorsed class distinctions, and was regulated in the term vernacular.

While the black vernaculars of the United States and Jamaica fail to be strongly marked by elements of African syntax or accentuation, they are strongly defined by the experience of continual struggle and are seen as resistant vernaculars. This is essential in remembering the trials that their ancestors went through when arriving in America as slaves. The history of the African-American writer is the struggle with the same question: whether to write English as the majority grew up hearing and speaking it, or to write in a manner closer to the standard literary prose of the times, and abandon their ancestral voices and the verbal realism by which so much writing was and still is judged.

Oral traditions are essential to this inquiry, due to the rich historical symbolism embedded within them. For this study, I look at the oral traditions of the Patois and African-American culture through folklore, poetry and song. I also wish to contrast this with the colonial historical perspective, poetry and song from the white culture within the same geographical area. The role of folklore in black literature is widespread, and quite integral to formal properties such as genre and trope.

In response to being labeled as "bad seeds" and "rough characters" by the dominant class, urban youth began to appropriate the words which were being used to portray them in a negative light.

"This tradition eventually became a reservoir of stylized expression that helped black people survive and affirm themselves as a culturally unique group," writes Robert Hemenway from In the American Canon: Redefining American Literary History. These stories help to correct the distortions that exist within the telling of history. The stories of Br'er Rabbit were created long before Joel Chandler Harris told them through the Character of Uncle Remus.

IN "THE WONDERFUL TAR-BABY STORY" and "Mr. Rabbit Grossly Deceives Mr. Fox," Chandler tells the story of how the smaller rabbit eventually overcame the fox.

Brer Fox creates a model rabbit with tar and turpentine and leaves it on the road for Brer Rabbit to see when coming down the road. Upon attacking the Tar-Baby, Brer Rabbit gets stuck, and is at the mercy of Brer Fox. As opposed to doing anything, Brer Fox invites him for dinner.

As the second story begins, Miss Meadows and the girls are mocking Brer Rabbit over the Tar-Baby incident. In response to this, Brer Rabbit remarks that Brer Fox was his daddy's riding horse for 30 years. When Brer Fox hears of this claim, he vows to make Brer Rabbit chew up his words and spit them out right where they can see them. Upon arriving at his house and inviting him to a party at Miss Meadows', Brer Rabbit tells Brer Fox that he is too sick to go out that day. Brer Fox offers to carry him down to her house, but Brer Rabbit refuses to go unless he can get him a saddle and a bridle so he won't be flung off. As they ride down to Miss Meadows', Brer Rabbit puts his spurs on and digs them into Brer Fox's side. Brer Rabbit makes him march right into Miss Meadows' house, where he boasts to everyone that Brer Fox was his family's riding horse.

The meanings of vernacular came to a halt with the use of the vernacular to symbolize "a slave: That is born on his master's estate; home born."

THE STORY OF ANANSI IS AN INTEGRAL part of Patois Folklore:

Anansi is a spider known for his ability to get the better of people. A famine had struck Anansi's homeland and he was forced to go to the Fish Country in search of food. Anansi dressed up as a doctor, and set up a fake office as soon as he arrived in Fish Country. His first patient was a very old lady with poor eyesight. He told her that he could cure her problem, and what she needed to do was to set up a big fire in her room. Beside the fire she was to set down a big pan, some coconut oil, and a sharp knife. As he enters her home Anansi tells her grandchildren to sing the words "Bini Bam, ni granmie eye well, ooh" and stamp to the beat. He tells them that they may not look inside the room. As the children sing away Anansi proceeds to cook up and eat the grandmother. When he goes back outside, Anansi takes the sni for his surgery and tells the fish that they can not see their grandmother for two hours.

In order to swiftly flee the Fish Country Anansi must cross a river deep in alligators. Quickly-thinking, he convinces Brerda Dog to divert the alligators while he crosses by bribing him with the money from the fake surgery. Anansi crosses the river just beyond the fish's reach. The story ends with Anansi running through the forest, taunting the fish by singing "Bini Bam, ni granmie eye well, ooh."

BOTH NARRATIVES TELL THE STORY OF A small animal overcoming all odds to out-smart bigger animals. Both can be seen as metaphors for a slave's freedom from his master.

Due to the superior technology of the British Colonisers, the British held complete physical authority over their slaves through the power that they held in the form of guns. The only way that one could defeat their master was by a battle of wits. In "Mr. Rabbit Grossly Deceives Mr. Fox," Brer Rabbit uses the master's technology of spurs and saddles in order to gain power over him. In "Anansi and Fish Country," Anansi is struggling through famine. This idea of hunger was constantly being discussed within the slave text. Anansi uses money; an idea brought to North America by the colonisers, in order to get back to shore. As long as his belly is full, money has no value to Anansi.

Language Development

IN THE PRESENT DAY THERE IS A POWER struggle occurring within the discourse of words within the English language. Words derived from the slave vernacular of America and Jamaica are now enjoying common use in all areas of society. One of the chief editors of the hip-hop magazine The Source recently remarked that "with hip-hop now readily available for mass-consumption, its effect on language is bananas. Our lingo is all the rage, and virtually all forms of media now scramble to talk the talk. Even Time magazine — about as bread and butter as publications get — is riddled with words that until a few years ago, were never heard above ground."

Three words, whose reappropriation occurred in different centuries, help explain this phenomenon. The word chill, or cool out is being used in everyday language to describe the physical action of relaxing. Its meaning originates in the south during the era of slavery. Due to the scorching heat that the slaves had to endure while picking cotton, it was always a relief to have a breeze cool down the temperature. Therefore, when the weather became slightly chilly, it became a more relaxing condition to work in.

The use of a negative word to denote a positive description has become commonplace within the vernacular. This has quickly made its mark on double-voiced discourse. The first use of this strategy occurred when people used bad to refer to something that was good. Soon, the words ill, sick, mad and rough all began to take on a positive connotation. In all these there is a change of the original meaning due to the history behind the word. In response to being labeled as "bad seeds" and "rough characters" by the dominant class, urban youth began to reappropriate the words which were being used to portray them in a negative light. Instead of these words having a negative connotation, they were now seen as positive labels for one to have. The youth had redirected the language which was originally meant to condemn them into one that condoned.

Language Reappropriation

THIRD, THERE'S THE ISSUE OF THE reappropriation of the word "nigger." The evolution of this word is brilliantly illustrated in the song "Sucky Nigga," by A Tribe Called Quest. The song begins with Q-Tip explaining the history of the word Nigga.

"See, nigga' was first used back in the deep south, calling out between the dome of the white man's mouth.

It means that we will never go, you know the word dummy, other nigga's in the community think it's crummy.

But I don't, neither does the you! 'cause we embrace it."

As the meaning of the word changed, so did the spelling. In the Webster's Dictionary the traditional 'er' ending is used, and its meaning is: "1: A black person, usually taken to be offensive. 3: a member of a socially disadvantaged class of persons." In the reappropriated African American spelling, it uses an 'a' ending, since this coincides with the way in which today's African-American youth pronounce the word.

Today, the meaning of nigger' has been reappropriated to mean one's brotha', or companion. But this does not mean that the original meaning has been forgotten: "Yo I start to flinch, as I try not to say it/ but my lips is like a doo-wop as I start to spray it." Here, Q-Tip reveals how he's still affected by the original meaning in his apprehension towards using the word.

At the same time though, he admits that using nigger' is as catchy as a funky doo-wop song, and therefore he can't avoid using it. By keeping the word alive in African-American culture, this ensures that the oppression and racism which blacks faced during the days of slavery will not be forgotten.

By reappropriating its meaning, the youth of today have changed the subjectivity of the word into one that today holds a positive meaning, as opposed to its traditional negative connotations. Just as Q-Tip finishes at the end of "Sucky Nigger": "It's the Neo-Nigger' of the nineties."

This compelling discourse is taken even further in "The Experience," a song recently released by the Atlanta based hip-hop group known as Goodie Mob (The Good Die Mostly Over Bullshit). The song begins with group member Cee-lo addressing specific members of the Hip-Hop community: "I thought you said you was the G.O.D. (Gones who've Gained their Own Definition in Life), sound like another Nigger' to me." Soon after they refer to the dominant ideology which has put them into this frame of mind: "A nigger' who has read history, but yet his eyes didn't see. The only reason you a nigger' cause somebody else want you to be."

Not only has the vernacular become part of today's society, but also now it is being reappropriated again by the music industry in order to maximize their profit.

Cee-lo is referring to the music industry's relentless quest to stereotype different bands into certain categories in order to increase record sales.

The Goodie Mob go on to describe the realities of life today, and contrast it with what may be the over riding belief within this culture. "Dividing and conquering when they say the ladder is black okay. After the middle-class, they passin' by the project land, now that's where we stay." While in today's world, one may postulate that everyone has an equal opportunity on the employment ladder, the reality is that it is just as differentiated today as it was 20 years ago.

Later on, Cee-lo seeks the wisdom of a wise female dread to help him with his problems: "She looked deep into my eyes, and said brother don't you know? You complain about being black when they mad that they can't be black no mo'."

Cee-lo then concludes "The Experience" with a telling line concerning how intertwined different cultures have become in this day and age: "The fact is, you ain't a nigger' because you're black, you a nigger' cause of how you act." In "The Experience" the discourse of the vernacular has gone full circle. Not only has the vernacular become part of today's society, but also now it is being reappropriated again by the music industry in order to maximize their profit. It's unbelievable to see the speed in which the meaning of words change in today's society.

Reappropriating Vernacular

TODAY, WORDS FROM THE VERNACULAR are becoming common place in every day language. African-Americans have stressed the importance of continuing to speak the vernacular of their ancestors. This is essential in remembering the trials, which their ancestors went through when arriving in America as slaves. It is clear that many African-Americans still face oppression today, and through using the slave vernacular, they make one fundamental claim: African Americans are still oppressed, still encountering discrimination and until this is changed, there is no reason to change their form of speech.

The group in power almost always writes history, and therefore the language it's written in represents that culture. As different forms of vernacular begin to become commonplace in English, the ideological control over language begins to move from the traditional, normative forms of words to the vernacular. In looking at the history of the word Vernacular, it becomes apparent that its original meaning was meant to subjugate those who wore its label. The history of these oppressed cultures is told in the vernacular through the oral tradition of folklore, poetry and song.

A combination of the traditional and vernacular histories is much more representative of the experience of the New World in the past 400 years. It is also much more representative of the ethnically diverse population whose first tongue is English. Furthermore, this move to the vernacular is becoming more widespread in groups suffering social and sexual oppression.

FOREVER YOUNG

On Monday, the Blue Jays' Roger Clemens became the first five-time winner of the Cy Young Award. Clemens was a unanimous selection, getting all 28 first-place votes. He won his second straight pitching triple-crown (leading in wins, ERA and strikeouts) after posting a 20-6 record, 2.71 ERA and 271 strikeouts. Clemens has been with Toronto two years now and has won the award each season. On Tuesday, Tom Glavine of the Atlanta Braves won his second Cy Young Award in the closest vote since 1987. Glavine, who won 20 games with an ERA of 2.47, edged out San Diego Padres reliever Trevor Hoffman (53 saves, 1.48 ERA) by only 11 votes.

HALL OPENS DOORS

At an awards ceremony in Toronto Monday night, players Peter Stastny and Michel Goulet were officially inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame. Stastny, with 1,239 career points, is the highest scoring European born-and-trained player in NHL history. Goulet, a prolific goal scorer in his prime, played 15 seasons (11 of them with the Quebec Nordiques) and had four consecutive 50-goal campaigns. He ended his career with 548 career goals which is third all-time among left-wingers. Howie Meeker was inducted into the Hall as a broadcaster, though he did have an NHL playing career as well.

FOUR TEAMS, ONE CUP

The semi-finals for the Vanier Cup have been set and there will be a new national champion. The defending champion UBC Thunderbirds were beaten out by the Saskatchewan Huskies in the Hardy Cup, paving the way for a Churchill Bowl showdown with the number one ranked Western Mustangs, who beat the Waterloo Warriors in the Yates Cup. In the Atlantic Bowl, it will be the Acadia Axemen taking on the Concordia Stingers from the O-QIFC. The Stingers had to survive a two-day, quadruple-overtime battle with the Laval Rouge et Or to get to this point.

IF CHRISTMAS CAME EARLY...
 • Governor-elect Jesse 'the Body' Ventura would suplex the first dissenter in the Minnesota legislature.
 • Roger Clemens would act like all other baseball people and give up on Jose Canseco.
 • Patrick Ewing would really know what it is like to not be able to feed a family.

Skating dynasty continues

By Robin Fonger

Who says 13 is an unlucky number?

Certainly not the Queen's varsity figure skating team. On Friday, the Gaels blasted into the season with a landslide victory at their invitational competition at Jock Hardy Arena. Queen's ranked first in a field of nine with a total of 72 points, followed by Waterloo and Guelph with 37 and 36 points respectively.

Over the past four years, the skating team has been undefeated, winning 13 consecutive competitions, including three OWIAA titles and the first OUA figure skating title last year. The team consists of 16 skaters who compete in 15 different events. Points are awarded for the final standing in each event and the total points for each team determines the winner of the competition.

In Friday's competition, Nicole Karki and Julie Marquardt placed first in Senior Similar Dance, while Karen Thomas placed first in the Open Solo Dance. Thomas and partner Jordan Miller grabbed first in the Variation Dance category and Christina Harper held on to eighth in the Senior Solo Dance category. In free-style events, Tara Black won Senior B Singles, Julie Ouellette earned first in Senior A Singles, Kath Boyer placed first in Open Singles, Laura Wright placed third in the Short Program, Leanne Findlay and Bonnie Lee placed third in Senior Similar Pairs, and Marion Roche finished fifth in the Intermediate Singles event.

The team has undergone a major overhaul this year with a change in coaching staff and the addition of six rookies. However, last Friday's competition has proved the combination of new coaches, Kim Magee and Dale Ashworth, in addition to long-time assistant coaches Johnny Yap and Andra Gilchrist, seems to be a success.

"The possibility [of winning another OUA title] is there, if the hard work and spirit continue."

"The rookies have adapted very well to the team," said Dance Coach Dale Ashworth. She also emphasized that the team has gelled very well together because of the veteran skaters.

"The onus is on the vets for really making it against the odds this year [with us] being new coaches. They have really brought up both our spirits and the teams' and I think I can say for both Kim and myself that

'No goals, no wins'

Women's soccer has a weekend to forget at the CIAUs.

By Adam Kaminsky

During the most important weekend of the CIAU soccer season, the sky opened up and drowned the Golden Gaels' championship dreams. The women's soccer team had their long trip to Victoria spoiled by a soggy field and a slow start, finishing out of the medals.

Calgary 2, Queen's 0 Dalhousie 0, Queen's 0

A 2-0 loss to the surprising Calgary Dinosaurus in the first round robin game eliminated them from gold medal contention and a 0-0 deadlock against the Dalhousie Tigers in the subsequent game put them out of the bronze medal match. It was a disappointing tournament for the highly touted squad.

"Soccer is a funny game," said CIAU coach of the year and Queen's Head Coach Dave McDowell. "It was one of those weekends that nothing went right."

For the Gaels it all started with the incessant rain, which began to fall the day before the opening of the round robin and their luck went south from there.

"We had a terrific practice before the tournament when we arrived in Victoria, but from there everything that could go wrong, did go wrong," said McDowell, who was struck by food poisoning on the trip.

The problems on the field for the squad began two minutes into their first game when an 'own goal' staked the eventual national champion Dinos to a 1-0 lead.

"[The early goal] was a heartbreaker," said midfielder Joanna Hackett, who was Queen's best player at the nationals. "It initially threw all of our game prep off, it was something you try to deal with, but it basically took the wind out of our sails."

Things went from bad to worse for Queen's when All-Canadian and team leader Judith Trepanier went down with a serious knee injury moments after the initial goal. While devastating for the team, it was truly crushing for the star midfielder.

"It is like your worst nightmare come true," said Trepanier, who spent last season rehabbing a similar injury. "It puts life in perspective for me. I would give all my awards and soccer success to just have my knee back to normal."

The team, rattled by the first goal and losing a leader, allowed a second goal 20 minutes into the first-half. This one was a beautiful tally set up by tournament MVP Stephanie O'Neill and finished capably by Leanne Pelosi.

"It was more likely that we spit nickels before scoring a goal [at the nationals]."

— Queen's sweeper Roileen Dunn

"The first 20 minutes really did us in, we couldn't get back in those [wet] conditions," explained McDowell. "It was especially difficult losing a key player, who lead physically, emotionally and mentally."

Queen's turned up the pressure in the second frame, bombarding the Calgary net with 15 shots to only four, but similar to the OUA championship game against Western, the team was unable to finish.

Due to the loss in the first game, the Gaels were forced to beat the Tigers, who had tied Calgary 1-1 two days earlier, to make the bronze medal game. For this important match the centre of the pitch at UVic's Centennial Stadium was a mud bath, which led to numerous throw-ins, errant kicks and spectacular spills, but was not conducive to goals. The flow of the game was as frustrating as a bad karaoke singer on a Sunday night.

The Gaels had the majority of the scoring opportunities in the first-half, with the best being created by the speedy All-Canadian striker Ange Crockett, but, again, the team couldn't put the ball away. Fortunately for Queen's, the team did a good job of containing Dalhousie's All-Canadian striker Mary Beth-Bowie, and tournament all-star forward Natalie Lindthaler. With superb

In the game

Fencing

In fencing action this weekend, Queen's participated in the Brock Invitational Tournament. While they did not bring home any medals, many excellent results were achieved. Alex Johnstone was narrowly defeated by a nationally ranked opponent and Andrew Cowan easily defeated a number of high-ranking fencers.

Three of Queen's more experienced fencers travelled to Munroville, Pennsylvania and participated in an international level competition. Team Captain Matthew Pinard placed in the top third of his field and Sabre Captain Bruce Precious and Foil Captain Charles Peng also fenced extremely well.

Women's hockey

The women's hockey team split their weekend games with the University of Windsor. On Friday, the Gaels rode an opportune offence and strong goaltending to capture their second win of the year, a 3-1 victory. On Saturday, the game was a close-knit battle in which Windsor squeaked by a margin of 3-2.

Men's basketball

Last weekend, in their season opener, the men's basketball team lost a heartbreaker to Toronto by a score of 58-57. The men's troubles continued with an overtime loss at the hands of the Ryerson Rams. The team swings through Quebec this weekend playing Laval and Bishop's.

Women's soccer

At the CIAU women's soccer awards banquet this past weekend in Victoria, the Queen's soccer team was awarded several accolades. Dave McDowell, who coached the Gaels to an undefeated regular season, was named the CIAU coach of the year. This was the second time McDowell received this honour, as he won it with Queen's in 1993. Defender Raelen Dunn was named an All-Canadian as was striker Angie Crockford.

Women's water polo

In women's water polo, the season-long struggle continues. While the Gaels managed to defeat Toronto by a count of 7-2, they lost to McMaster 9-4 and were pummeled by York 13-3. Hopefully, the Gaels will be able to compose themselves before the entire season is lost.

Men's squash

In men's squash, Queen's travelled to Waterloo to participate in the OUA East vs. West crossover tournament. They placed third out of eight teams with a strong performance by Stacey Bell, who went undefeated in four difficult matches. Ryan Clark and Alistair Rayner both won three of their four respective matches.

Women's volleyball

The squad collected two victories this weekend. The first was a tough five-set victory over Ryerson followed by a three set walk in the park over the Carleton Ravens. The team is now three and one in league play.

Queen's slam dunks Toronto and Ryerson

BY NEATE SAGER

The city of Toronto was very good to the Queen's women's basketball team last weekend, as they returned from Hogroon with a pair of hard-fought road victories.

Queen's 68, U of T 65
Queen's 65, Ryerson 57

In last Friday's regular-season opener, the Gaels defeated rival University of Toronto Blues 68-65, then followed that win by registering a 65-57 decision over the Ryerson Rams on Saturday.

"We played pretty solid basketball, but not particularly outstanding," remarked Queen's Head Coach Dave Wilson.

On Friday, the Gaels started slowly, allowing the Varsity to build an early ten-point lead, before settling down and clawing back into the contest, pulling ahead to stay before halftime.

In the second half, the visiting Gaels were able to stave off the home side; while the Queen's lead was never more than eight points, the Blues were never able to draw closer than the final three-point margin. Shooting guard Jacqueline Beaudoin, the Journal Athlete of the Week, played a pivotal role in the victory, notching 21 points, while point guard Deannah Shelley (12 points, 11 rebounds) and veteran post Wendy Moon (18 and 10) each recorded a "double-double" - reaching double figures in both points and rebounds.

"There's nothing glaring about us on defense. We were very solid and put excellent pressure on the ball."

— Head Coach Dave Wilson

Against Ryerson on Saturday, the Gaels again overcame an inauspicious beginning, recovering sufficiently to build a solid lead before intermission, leading by seven points at half-time. Early in the second half, the Tricolour began to pull away steadily from the Rams, until a prolonged delay caused by a malfunctioning scoreboard sapped some of their momentum. Nonetheless, the Gaels were able to assert themselves, playing their trademark stingy defense, and came away with an eight-point win. Beaudoin again paced Queen's offensively, this time with 20 points, while second-year forward Jennifer Jackson, a Kingston native, added 12.

In summarizing an ultimately successful opening weekend, Wilson commented, "Our execution needs to be sharper... we have to make better decisions as to where the ball should be [while on offense]... that's typical of the early season, though."

Wilson was satisfied with his team's collective effort defensively. "There's nothing glaring about us on defense. We were very solid and put excellent pressure on the ball," he said.

Currently ranked eighth in the country, the Gaels' national ranking will be put under heavy scrutiny this weekend when they venture to Quebec to play ninth-ranked Laval and tenth-ranked Bishop's. A good showing in La Belle Province could vault the Gaels into the top five.

Another easy win

we are very proud of the team," she said.

With all of the changes this year, the Gaels have managed to maintain one of the characteristics that has set them apart from other universities. "Our team is unique in that we bond both as athletes and good friends," explained Leanne Findlay, one of the teams three captains.

Co-captain Karen Thomas also admitted "it has been the continual support within the team that has been one of the major factors involved in reaching our goal each year, which is skating our best and ultimately winning finals."

Having won the first of the season's three competitions, the team looks well on their way to winning another OUA final.

"The possibility of winning another OUA title is there, if the hard work and spirit continue," said Ashworth.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

A new position, the same great performance

Jacqueline Beaudoin

Beaudoin's offensive skills.

"There is no question that she has the ability to score, which the point guard position doesn't always allow for," said Coach Wilson. "It is also a way to keep from splitting [floor] time between Deannah and Jacqueline."

Beaudoin, who spent her first two seasons sharing time at point guard with Deannah Shelley, was moved to the small forward position before this season. Head Coach Dave Wilson made this decision for a number of reasons, but mainly it was to take advantage of

An impressive run

BY SARAH CRASBE

The tight corners and hilly terrain at the CIAU championships were no match this past weekend for the Queen's men's and women's Cross Country teams.

Competing this weekend in Waterloo, both teams finished a successful season with a third-place finish by the women and a fifth-place finish by the men. This was the first time in Queen's history that a men's and women's team from the same sport both finished in the top five at the national championships.

"In order to win, everyone had to perform a personal best. Everyone ran really hard."

— Queen's All-Canadian Charlotte Wilks

Over 250 runners from nine provinces represented a record 30 universities at the championships. Athletes from 23 universities ran in the women's five kilometre race, including 16 full teams. The women were ranked fifth overall in the nation going into the championships, but with season and lifetime-best performances by most of the team, they were able to capture the bronze medal, beating the defending champions from Guelph.

"It was a great day for the team. We were the underdogs in the race and in order to win, everyone had to perform a personal best. Everyone ran really hard," said third-year student Charlotte Wilks, second team All-Canadian, and changed over there. I am happy and comfortable at the new position."

The fact that the switch was made so easily is no surprise to Coach Wilson, who predicted that Jacqueline had the ability to score a lot in the OUA, but her quick start excites the coach.

"It is more a matter of her understanding how good she is physically than of where she is on the floor," he said. "She is discovering new things about her athletic ability every game. Who she can beat off the dribble, who she can shoot over and what shots she can hit."

CFRC basketball analyst Phil Vrkljan agreed with the coach's assessment.

"[Beaudoin] has the best cross-over move and mid range jumper I have seen in some time," Vrkljan said.

The early success is promising for the team, but this is only the beginning of a long, winding road to Lakehead for the CIAU championships.

"We have really high expectations for this year, but we realize we have to work hard in our league, there are no pushovers," said Beaudoin.

Vrkljan feels that in her new position, Beaudoin could help make the difference between a good team and a great team.

"She'll play an integral part in taking them to the next level in her new role as a scorer," he explained.

If this is only the beginning of Beaudoin's learning curve, this could be a very exciting season for the women's basketball team.

A spectacular jump

BY CHUCK HOLT

Before I jumped, I didn't know what to think of skydiving. Perhaps, I thought, it would be just like that movie Point Break. You remember: It's the one where Johnny Utah chases Bodie and his band of surfing/skydiving ex-president bank robbers around California. Well, in Point Break, Bodie and Utah seem to just float there in the air when they skydive. It is almost as if they are flying until they open their parachutes. I guess that is what I thought it would feel like.

Well, it didn't. The reality of the situation was that I jumped out of the open door of Cessna 206, and fell. Picture yourself almost one kilometre in the sky, and plummeting towards the earth. That is what really happened, and that is what it felt like. If I had realized this, as I sat crouched by the open door of the airplane, staring down, I would have been much more scared. Still, skydiving was the most exhilarating experience of my life.

Of course, this was just my first jump, and thankfully the instructors did not let me free fall too long. In fact, all first jumps are Instructor Assisted Dives (IAD's), meaning that the instructor pulls your "pilot chute" (which initiates the opening of the main chute), while you are still in the airplane. Therefore, students only free-fall for about two seconds before they are slowed down by their main chute. But, it's an intense two seconds.

Because everything went according to plan, and the reserve chute was backs Nicole Miller and Jenn 'Birdie' Sarginson doing the marking and All-Canadian sweeper Raelen Dunn backing them up, the Tigers couldn't mount much pressure on the Gaels' goal.

The second-half saw some Dalhousie offensive momentum, but Queen's kept the ball out and then dominated the final 10 minutes of the game, with Crockford setting up another brilliant chance. The story for the Gaels remained the same: controlling play, but not making it count on the scoreboard.

"It was more likely that we spit nickels before scoring a goal [at the nationals]," lamented Dunn, who played an exceptional tournament.

Coach McDowell summed it up simply by saying, "No excuses, no goals, no wins, it's soccer and that's life."

Despite the team missing its ultimate goal of a national title, the coach is happy with how the team played and acted throughout the season.

"I am proud of the way this team played this season, they had a consistent season, a great season," he said. "I am also proud of how sporting our team was off the field and how they stayed together."

It is the spirit of this team on and off the field that shows that despite the fact they didn't realize their dream and win the CIAU crown, this season was the time of their lives.

A big money game

The NBA lockout hurts players, owners and fans.

THE WORD ON THE STREET:

WITH KINGSTON receiving its initial dose of winter earlier this week, the heat of July 1 seems a distant memory. To sports fans it seems even further away, as that day marked the beginning of the seemingly interminable NBA lockout.

The NBA was the last major sports league to lose games to a work stoppage, but they are engaging in this bitter labour (a word that always strikes me as a strange one to attach to professional athletes, but no matter) dispute like seasoned veterans.

On Tuesday, Russ Granik, the Deputy Commissioner of the NBA, announced that collective agreement negotiations between the owners and the NBA Players' Association would resume today after a prolonged period of silence between the parties. Granik described the meeting Tuesday as "cordial, but unproductive", a statement which, unfortunately, marks a significant advance in these negotiations.

The adversarial stand adopted by the two groups has served only to hurt professional basketball and will almost certainly endanger the future viability of the $2 billion annual industry.

Should the players and owners reach an agreement today (which is unlikely, to say the least), play would not resume until at least December 15, with a more reasonable estimate being closer to Christmas. A total of 108 games have been missed so far, and the NBA recently announced that while the February 14 All-Star Game in Philadelphia remains on the schedule, the popular interactive fan exhibition 'Jam Session,' which runs the duration of All-Star Weekend, has been cancelled.

The issues are numerous, and as always, extremely complex. The two largest stumbling blocks are a mixture of salary cap and free agency eligibility, and revenue distribution. In short, the owners want an end to the so-called 'Larry Bird' exemption, which allows teams to circumvent the existing salary cap by re-signing their own free agents for any amount, and to institute a restricted free agency system, allowing teams the right to match the offers of other teams for their free agents in certain circumstances. Obviously, the players' union, disproportionately represented in negotiations by high-end income earners like Michael Jordan and Patrick Ewing, want to maintain the Larry Bird exemption and are unwilling to compromise on unfettered free agency after a player has been in the league for a given number of years.

With regard to revenue distribution, the owners want to limit the amount of Basketball Related Income (BRI) that is paid to players in salary and the like to 50 per cent, down from the 57 per cent it was last season, and even further from the 60 per cent the NBAPA is demanding. Further, the owners wish to narrow the definition of BRI with the effect that those percentages reflect a portion of a smaller 'pie.'

The players resist this, pointing out the increasing income from other sources, including the corporate naming of new and existing arenas, among others. The financial issues are difficult to reconcile, given that the owners and players cannot even agree on the balance sheets, with the owners claiming that 15 of 29 teams are in the red, while the players submit that only 4 lose money. Some of the other issues which have not been officially resolved, but likely will not pose an obstacle to the signing of a new collective agreement, including rookie contracts, the banning of marijuana use and the general authority of the NBA.

In particular, the NBAPA resists the owners demand that marijuana be banned and tested for, but recognizing the politically tenuous nature of this stand is likely to deal this issue away as a bargaining chip for more substantial concerns. The players also feel that the NBA went too far by voiding the remaining term of the contract of Latrell Sprewell following his much-publicized choking of coach P.J. Carlesimo, and want the authority of the NBA to fine, suspend and otherwise discipline better players defined in the future.

Many of the players seem to have given up hope. Each day brings news of another prominent player who is casting their eyes to the big paycheques of Europe to pay for that third Lexus.

Many of the players seem to have given up hope. Each day brings news of another prominent player who is casting their eyes to the big paycheques of Europe in order to pay for that third Lexus. 1998 first overall pick Michael Olowokandi, numerous other unsigned draft picks, and more notably established stars such as Gary Payton and Karl Malone have registered their interest overseas. Various underclass draftees and free agents are looking for alternate plans, including Antawn Jamison, who is back in Chapel Hill working out with a North Carolina team with whom he undoubtedly wishes he could play.

The two sides evidently remain far apart. While the issues that divide them are certainly substantial, the adversarial stand adopted by the two groups has served only to hurt professional basketball and will almost certainly endanger the future viability of the $2 billion (not a misprint) annual industry that the NBA has become.

While baseball seems to have recovered from the work stoppages which have plagued it in recent memory, it has two things on its side. One, this past year was a historical year on a number of fronts. A two-pronged assault on a venerable home run record, the season-long excellence of perhaps the greatest team in history and Cal Ripken's decision to sit down (finally!) will not happen every year, yet they were instrumental in bringing the fans back to baseball this year.

Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, basketball simply does not have the capital of traditional attachment to draw upon to the extent that baseball does (perhaps with the exception of the New York Knicks). Basketball is riding a wave right now, but it remains to be seen if it will ever be as ingrained in American culture as baseball is.

The parties seem to have forgotten that the NBA was struggling daily to remain in existence as recently as the late 1970s. Perhaps the most illustrative element of this matter is that the North-American sports fan simply seems not to care if the league ever resumes operation or not. While sports work stoppages are almost always characterized by amounts of money that the ticket-buying fan cannot relate to, the NBA, with young millionaires squabbling with old billionaires, is perhaps the worst example of all. The widespread ambivalence of the sports-viewing public to the lockout itself should be sounding an alarm to David Stern and Billy Hunter, making it clear to them that they are killing the goose that laid the golden egg.

Ian 'NASCAR' Brisbin would rather be watching a sport where if they want more money, they go out and race for it!

Run, bike and burn

BY ROBERT MACNEIL

Last weekend, the Queen's Triathlon Club hosted the ninth annual "Hammer, Dash and Burn," a duathlon which takes place at Myles Acres outside Kingston.

The Queen's race, which is organized by the triathlon executives, is the only one that includes mountain biking. The duathlon consists of a two kilometre run, an eight kilometre bike ride, and concludes with another two kilometre run.

Executive member Carolyn Pedwell, herself a participant, was impressed with the turnout. "We had over 100 people competing and we had people from different universities, Western, Mac and Waterloo."

Also participating were students from Trent and RMC.

While the list of trained athletes was impressive, Pedwell was glad to see members of the "Queen's community who may be on the recreational triathlon club, or [may have] just come out for the day" participating as well.

In the male category, the best overall score went to Tim Blackwell of RMC with a time of 22:35, the best rookie time was Queen's own Phil Dempsey at 24:48.

In the female category, the fastest overall time was by McMaster's Rachel Simpson (26:47) and the fastest rookie time was Queen's own Phil Dempsey at 28:40.

In the under 20 field, Henry 'Dr. Death' Fletcher of Queen's finished with a mark of 24:42 and Aniela Stelpowicz finished with a time of 35:42. In the 20-24 range, the top performers were both from Queen's, Ka-yu Law (23:46) and Martha McKay (30:39). In the 25 and over grouping, the top male athlete was Colin MacDougall (24:32) of Western and Melanie Bago (31:33) was the top female athlete.

Moving with the Maestro

Hip hop makes a comeback at Queen's

CONCERT REVIEW

BY KEVIN LORRIMER

Conducting: Maestro was in fine form at Alie's last Friday.

Maestro, one of Canada's most successful hip hop artists, returned from a five-year hiatus to headline Friday's show at Alie's. Maestro thoroughly satisfied Queen's longing for hip hop with an awesome performance despite some serious technical problems that occurred before he even hit the stage.

The opening act had Thrust and his crew Fudge tearing the stage. Thrust opened with a sub-par, lyrically simplistic performance with the exception of the memorable, "Emcee." Thrust's battle-ready rhymes were solid enough to hold the crowd over until Maestro blessed the stage, except his dousing of the speakers with water meant for the crowd, caused a rift in the room's energy. The watered down speakers caused a delay that lasted about half an hour.

Once Maestro arrived, he proceeded to move the crowd with a hybrid of songs from past records and his recently released album, Built to Last. While listening to Maestro's old and new material, one could not help but notice the lyrical maturity he displays on his new album. His lyrics no longer depict a party-rocking ladies' man.

In a brief interview after the show, Maestro said that artists have to be lyrically versatile and cover important issues affecting their community, while at the same time, entertain.

One new song he performed, "Stick To Your Vision," vividly described the highs and lows he experienced during his decade long music career. This was without a doubt the smoothest track I have heard Maestro perform since, "Fine Tune Da Mic." However, the majority of the Alie's crowd seemed to be satisfied rocking to oldies like, "I'm Showin' You," and "Conducting Thangs." Maestro, knowing that most of the audience had not heard most of his new releases, introduced the new tracks in a conversational manner. This kept the concert flowing smoothly through a sea of technical difficulties and crowd control problems. On three or four separate occasions he relied on his newfound rapport with the audience to discourage the crowd from forcing themselves up on the stage.

Maestro ended the night triumphantly by entering a sea of women in the crowd and tipping into, "Let Your Backbone Slide." Apparently his new rhyme style did not have any ill effects on his appearance in the eyes of the women.

I hope that Maestro's strong performance, combined with last month's show featuring Cardinal Offishall and the Rascalz, proved to Queen's that we now have an alternate form of entertainment to enjoy. Canada is home to other hip hop acts of equal quality, and while I commend the QEA for diversifying campus entertainment, I would also like to challenge them to continue to bring quality hip hop to the Queen's campus.

The Cardigans Gran Turismo Polygram Records

BY JESSE CRAIG BELLINGER

On Gran Turismo, The Cardigans leave behind the flightiness that characterized their earlier efforts, Life and the more recent, more popular First Band on the Moon. The latter, which included the band's first major North American success in the form of the catchy but often misinterpreted "Lovefool," established The Cardigans' sound as traditional power-pop with a healthy dose of post-sixties kitsch. Nina Persson's unmistakably delicate voice gave the band a sound that often sounded as pretty as it did ironic; hence the confusion that surrounded "Lovefool," a sharply ironic song about obsessively destructive love in the tradition of The Police's "Every Breath You Take" and U2's "With or Without You."

No such misinterpretations will be made on Gran Turismo. Following the recent endemic trend of incorporating house beats and electronica-inspired ambience into an established sound, The Cardigans dive into unfamiliar territory only vaguely hinted at in their previous releases. It's a radical turn for a group so sunny about their cynicism. Surprisingly, it's largely effective. The discovery of minor chords and Eno-like atmospherics are sometimes inspired (as in "Higher" and "Explode") and only occasionally miss the mark (as in the repetitive and sub-standard lead single, "My Favourite Game").

Where the album falters is in Persson's development as a lyricist. Where the band succeeds in achieving a new level of sophistication, Persson's lyrics often skirt the edge of the kind of naive melodrama so ubiquitous in light-hearted pop music. While the sound of her voice is a fine complement to the new, darker sound, Persson's sometimes embarrassing attempts at bringing that darkness to her lyrics is a jump she is not yet capable of making. It should be noted that while Persson is the principle songwriter, various other band members also contribute the album's lyrics.

Despite the growing pains, Gran Turismo is a strong release that succeeds in pushing the band in new directions. Fans of "Lovefool" will be in for a bit of reorientation, however; the candy-coated sweetness of The Cardigans' previous efforts has receded to the background.

All warm and Cuddy

Blue Rodeo's frontman set for Stages

INTERVIEW

BY STEFAN MURRAY

After 12 years of being a member of one of Canada's most successful songwriting partnerships, Jim Cuddy is going it alone.

Less than two years after the release of Temolo, Blue Rodeo's most recent album, Cuddy has recorded his first solo effort All In Time and is performing across Canada to promote it. On Tuesday, he comes to Kingston.

In an interview with The Journal, Cuddy described his new album as a personal opportunity to sever the routine of being merely the other half of Blue Rodeo.

"One has to break the mould every so often. This album is born of spreading out, doing something different," he said. The album is a 12 song country-rock experience, reminiscent of Blue Rodeo's discography, but more string driven and not as ballad heavy. The songs are similar to Blue Rodeo albums of the early nineties, containing elements of both Casino and Lost Together. According to Cuddy, the album is "more connected to my own history, the raw materials and pivotal points of my life that allowed me to remain a musician and avoid getting a real job."

Cuddy and Greg Keelor formed Blue Rodeo 13 years ago and have released seven albums that have succeeded both critically and financially in that time. All In Time marks the first time in more than a decade that Cuddy has been alone in the role of songwriter, a situation that caused a small amount of skepticism in the musician.

"When I began I said 'My God, I'm here alone. I can't make all these decisions!'" said Cuddy. "But eventually I thought, here's a bunch of friends, let's play some music." The friends which Cuddy referred to are members of notable hands that helped in the recording of the album and served as back-up members for live shows. Colin Cripps and Michelle McAdorey, formerly of Crabb Vegas, Sarah Harner of Weeping Tile, Andy Maize from the Skydiggers, along with familiar names from Blue Rodeo all helped out in the production of the album.

Kingston residents will get their first taste of Cuddy's solo work on Tuesday when he plays Stages. The response that Kingston and Queen's provides Cuddy will all depend on the acceptance of country rock in the area, according to Cuddy. "People won't come because it's a hip thing, because it's not. It's a specific sound," he said.

Female trio pack downtown hangout

CONCERT REVIEW

By JEFF CHILD

Ahh, satisfaction. That was the general consensus of the cozy crowd at Club 477 on Monday night and for good reason. Juno nominated folk group, The Wyrd Sisters, privileged us with their appearance — it was an evening of intimacy, spiritual healing and good musicianship.

The Club packed in a hearty crowd to show off the exceptional talent. There wasn't an empty seat in the house. Adoring fans elected to sit on the edge of the bar to get a good view of the group. Who could blame them? The highly talented Winnipeg trio set the atmosphere and took control. The six piece ensemble, led by Lianne Fournier, Nancy Reinhold and Kim Baryluk, delivered a well orchestrated sound. Instrumentally, the evening was highlighted by organ player Fournier, and Reinhold's keen folk-guitar arrangements.

To start the second set, Baryluk lead the crowd in a chorus of orgasmic moans that left the audience begging for more.

The three-part harmonies sensuously vibrated from the three vocalists, while their accompaniment rounded out the sound. At one point their fiddler went into a Hendrix-like guitar solo, on his violin, while Baryluk playfully entered the crowd to take Polaroids of herself with her admirers.

Without a doubt, the Wyrd Sisters are emerging as one of Canada's most talented and inspiring groups. From jazzy rhythms to country guitar licks, the Sisters embrace an eclectic folk sound. Above all, these women don't play it safe. While many Canadian musicians have become complacent with recycling the same old shit, the Wyrd Sisters seem to be using music as a holistic healer.

While the music was superb, it seemed to serve as a background to the group's interaction with the audience. The show was not dominated by the music. Instead, the Sisters talked, laughed and danced with the audience. It was a unique performance that allowed for spiritual and emotional healing. The intelligent and humorous insight into life was welcomed by the crowd.

MANIPULATION BY TARA MANSBRIDGE

The Wyrd Sisters addressed issues that ranged from environmentalism in the song "Farewell to Clayoquot Sound," to the discrimination encountered by gays and lesbians in Canadian society.

While the music and the discussion was intense, Baryluk was able to keep the mood light-hearted with her humorous stance on sexuality. To start the second set with a bang, she lead the crowd in a chorus of orgasmic moans that left the audience begging for more. It seemed as though she was able to warm up more than just her voice. The group's ability to connect intimately with the crowd is unparalleled by any band that I have seen live. From sexual innuendoes to waltzing with members of the audience, the trio offered more than just song-bird voices.

While most performers are turning off the lights in their heads and formatting their music to high-selling pop drive, The Wyrd Sisters are opening audiences to the concept of interactive, thought-provoking music.

I was once told that music had the ability to express and heal. I didn't believe it until I heard the Wyrd Sisters.

CONCERT REVIEW

By NEIL ACHARYA

Hayden emerged on stage last Thursday night in his trademark red plaid shirt and announced to the sold out Trasheteria crowd, "It's been six months and five days since my last visit here."

Actually he was a bit off. It had been exactly six and a half months since his last visit to Kingston. However, Hayden can be excused for his inaccuracy. After all, a lot has transpired since then. He has released his first album, The Closer I Get, since signing with Outpost records in January 1996. As well, he is on the verge of completing his first tour with his newly-formed band. The tour has covered Canada the U.S. and even Japan. Hayden stated, "I think every night has been amazing."

The opening act at the Trash was Juliana Hatfield who performed an acoustic set. Hayden opened for her for three weeks while in the U.S. and she returned the favor by opening for him here in Canada.

Hayden was well received by the audience when he stepped on stage. He cycled through new and old tracks, from the smash indie hit album Everything I Long For, to The Closer I Get, while also playing a couple of songs from his eight song EP Moving Careful. The highlight of the first set was when he let the crowd sing the last few lines of "Bad As They Seem," with Hayden saying afterwards, "that was beautiful."

Hayden also played "Trees Lounge," the song he wrote for the Steve Buscemi movie of the same name.

"I watched the movie and loved it, I wrote the song that night." Hayden explained in an interview with The Journal.

He said the way he writes a song is different almost every time.

More than anything, he showed that he has succeeded in making the transition from being a solo act to performing with a band.

"Sometimes something happens that hour and I'll write it down and I write the music and it's really quick. Sometimes I have music lying around for a year and then I write something down and fit it into the music. There are some songs I wrote when I was younger that I just don't do anymore."

At times the audience shouted our requests and Hayden replied half jokingly "I forgot the words to that song." The songs "I Almost Cried" and "Bunkbeds" are examples of songs with forgotten lyrics. These songs were dropped from Everything I Long For when it was re-released after his signing with Outpost records.

Aided by a band, he performed many of his newest songs including "Hazards of Sitting Beneath Palm Trees" and his revamped version of "Stride" which employed numerous gadgets as instruments, such as air escaping from a balloon.

Hayden was called back for two encores where he showed his musical talent as he abandoned his guitar in favour of the piano, in covering Leonard Cohen's "Famous Blue Raincoat." Earlier in the night he played what he titled, "The Neil Young song" in honour of Neil Young's 53rd birthday. Both Cohen and Young are among Hayden's musical influences.

Hayden did not disappoint the capacity crowd. More than anything, he showed that he has succeeded in making the transition from being a solo act to performing with a band.

It also seems that even though he was the centre of a bidding war involving major record companies, he has taken it in stride and concentrated on putting out good music.

"I think I've changed a bit, I don't know how something like [the bidding war] can not change a person" he said. "Hopefully it wasn't for the worst."

Hayden is on the last leg of his tour which will wrap up in mid-December. He stated after his tour, "I plan to relax, read a few books and play music, when I want to play it."

Grin Doctors: Med TV performers display some alternative medicine

VARIETY SHOW REVIEW

By TARA MANSBRIDGE

All the usual signs of winter have arrived: mittens, fallen snow, and Queen's Medical Variety Night '98 has hit campus with a bang.

All gloomy thoughts of the upcoming months of snow, slush and cold aside, what better way to have spent a cold evening at Queen's than sitting with a friend and watching our future medical practitioners make absolute fools of themselves?

I, and approximately 400 others looking for a break from the cold, packed Grant Hall on Thursday, November 12 to enjoy an evening of mucous jokes and sight gags involving small intestines. Now, I've been a devotee of MVN for some time, and I've seen shows that ranged from spectacular to downright bad, so I knew basically what to expect of the evening.

MVN is a wonderful opportunity to raise money for various charities around Kingston, and to wake the latent comedic talent of all the med keeners out there. But, I've never expected MVN to blow my mind and, frankly, if it did I'd be a little worried about the future of Canada's health care system.

As expected, MED TV 1998, didn't blow my mind, but I was pleasantly surprised by the breadth of talent which graced the stage during my two-and-a-half hour stint at Grant. The opening and closing numbers weren't up to their usual standard of grandiosity, and the overall theme of MED TV was very loosely conveyed by a commentator ostensibly watching TV in an ottoman off to the side of the audience, but that device did let the diversity of talent shine.

Of special note were the Med Squad, Double Concerto in D Minor, Remember This! and Surgery Night in Canada performances. The first, a music video by five members of Meds '01 featured four medical students cast in the roles of the four members of the Mod Squad.

The Double Concerto in D Minor, performed by Erin Culbert and Karen Seigel, at first struck the ears as a lovely string duet — that is, until the pair artfully segued into such popular tunes as the theme to X-Files, the love song from Titanic and the theme from Star Trek, among others, and just as artfully segued back into Bach.

Remember This! was an original musical piece performed by four nursing students, Chris Byczko, Sophie Ikura, Claire Nguyen and Rod Oandasan. Because MVN organizers (thankfully!) printed the lyrics to many of the musical numbers in the program, the audience was able to follow along with

Queen's Player return with success

SHOW REVIEW

By ADRIA VUKSINIC

The audience screams 'sing' and they do. The Queen's Players present... Cheubacca To the Future, a musical comedy about the misadventures of the casts of Back to the Future and Star Wars.

When a computer named Qlink takes over the world and threatens to start World War Three, the only logical thing to do is go Back to the Future and stop Qlink. Along the way to save the world however, there is always time to stop and sing a little song.

During the show, cast members belt out tunes from many different decades, including the sixties and eighties, and their repertoire also includes show tunes. Modern hits such as Will Smith's "Gettin' jiggy wid it" and Madonna's "Ray of Light" are some of the best performed songs of the show. The funniest performances came from the skits, in comparison to the musical sections, tend to lack character and seem weak and rushed. ## Play pleases with comedy

By JESSE CRAIG BELLINGER

When newlyweds Jennifer Radford Gibson and Matthew Gibson went to Paris recently on their honeymoon, the last thing they expected to bring back to Kingston with them was April in Paris — but that's exactly what they did.

After discovering the play by way of a friend's recommendation while overseas, the co-founders of Kingston's The Seat of Your Pants Theatre Company decided to add it to their slate of productions. While the play's plot is somewhat of a strange choice for happy newlyweds — a feuding and unhappy couple unexpectedly travel to Paris from their Yorkshire home and slowly sort out their marriage — the eventual outcome is heart-warming and touching.

Matthew Gibson takes on the role of Al, one half of the feuding couple. Gibson manages to radiate an endearing warmth and decency even when Al is at his irritating worst. His mastery of the idiosyncrasies and quirks that make a person so complicated give Al a depth and personality that I wish some people I know off-stage could possess. While some of the play's more melodramatic turns take their toll on Gibson, he carries off humorous dialogue with ease and is never dull.

Jane McGaughey plays Bet, Al's frustrated and vindictive wife. Where Gibson plays Al as though unemployment and age have taken a heavy toll on his personal life, McGaughey's take on Bet makes one wonder why they ever married in the first place. Playing Bet with a cold, post-feminist bitterness that never truly thaws despite the play's upbeat conclusion, McGaughey nonetheless gives her character a well-rounded and believable personality.

One wonders occasionally if this is a marriage worth saving, it is only Al's good-natured and honest admissions that give the relationship any charm. But it is truly the underlying theme of forgiveness and reconciliation that allows the play to border the melodramatic.

That said, the play itself is entertaining and fun. The exceptionally minimal set gives the actors plenty of attention, which is good because both Gibson and McGaughey are fine actors and are entirely convincing. There are some great comedic moments, which is where April in Paris truly triumphs.

Maybe it's the honeymoon photos that comprise most of the play's publicity (including the beautiful promotional posters), or maybe it's because we can imagine Jennifer and Matthew taking drinks on those Parisian sidewalks themselves, but the couple's eventual reconciliation — melodrama and bitterness aside — is an affecting conclusion to a humorous play that is all about remembering to appreciate what we already possess.

April in Paris is playing at the Baby Grand from November 19-22 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $12 for adults, $10 for students and seniors.

Various Artists
Pleasantville Soundtrack
Sony Music

By ROB DE BELLEFEUILLE

The Pleasantville soundtrack is a consummately American selection of nostalgic music drawn mainly from the fifties.

The soundtrack is captained by the young songstress Fiona Apple, who covers a pair of classics, most notably the poetic Beatles' track "Across the Universe." The effort Apple puts forth is simply abysmal — she sounds as if she is attempting to mimic John Lennon through muttering like a manic depressive. Sorry, no dice.

The majority of the mundane melodies on this disc can be likened to my traumatic experience of being banished from the popular elementary school crowd. Unbeknownst to me, I had arrived at school in a lower class running shoe brand infamously known as Trax; as they were inferior to Nike, and I was cast into the badlands until I had properly sold out.

At the other end of the spectrum is "Rave On," a Buddy Holly classic that gave me the urge to wiggle my ass onto the dance floor with the ferocious fervor of Elvis "the Pelvis" Presley. Coincidentally the King himself is also on the compilation with "Teddy Bear." If you have never heard this inescapable juggernaut for yourself, then please, OOGA BOOGA, show me to your cave. Jazz icon Miles Davis also contributes a formidable piece while Gene Vincent spikes the punch with the infectious "Be-Bop-Alula" at this otherwise lame chip and pop party.

After these last vestiges of taste leave their marks, the remainder of the album trolls until it is finally unmasked for the shoddy Scooby Doo villain it is.

To put it in the prophetic words of the android/clone played by Rautger Hauer in the film Bladerunner: "All these memories will be lost like tears in the rain." The same can be said about this disc in your collection.

Rolling Stones
No Security
Virgin Records

By ROBERT MACNEIL

The Rolling Stones' latest release, No Security, is yet another testament to the group's reputation as the greatest live rock and roll band ever. This 14 song compilation from 1997's Bridges to Babylon World Tour, may be viewed by some as simply being a souvenir from the concerts, but for those who could not get tickets, the sublimely soulful sound of the Stones on this CD will be a feast for the ears.

The Stones freshen up their latest live album by including three guest appearances from the tour: "On Memory Motel," written in 1976, Dave Matthews joins Mick Jagger on stage for a remarkable duet that adds spice to a classic song.

The saxophone talents of Joshua Redman are added to "Waiting on a Friend," and the result is both sweet and soulful. Redman's sax meshes instantly with Jagger's vocals and the guitar work of Stone(d) legends Keith Richards and Ronnie Wood.

The inclusion of 1969's "Corrina," written by Taj Mahal, is a wonderful blues number and the band is joined on stage by Mahal himself. The version of this song shows fans why the Stones, for all their success as a rock and roll act, remain one of the best blues bands ever. On all the tracks, the legendary drumming talents of Charlie Watts are highlighted and when the volume is cranked, his steady beat remains at the heart of the Jagger/Richards compilations.

The disc also includes powerful live versions of songs from the Bridges to Babylon album — among the highlights is a bluesy rendition of "Saint of Me" that had the crowd singing a cappella to the chorus. The inclusion of "This could be) The Last Time," written in 1965, shows that the Stones can still deliver the goods on their songs that are almost 35 years old.

The Stones proved long ago that they were not going to simply rest on their laurels. This album only adds in increasing the mystique that surrounds the band that keeps on going as they prepare to embark on yet another world tour — named after this latest release, No Security.

An Acoustic Sin
Of Four Corners
Giraffe Productions

By KEN BUTLAND

What is going on in New Brunswick? Are they putting chemicals in their water? I don't know how else to account for An Acoustic Sin and their album Of Four Corners, a frightening cross between Metallica, Dave Matthews and God knows what else.

Their impressive instrumentation (harmonica, banjo, mandolin, accordion, dulcimer, a dobro) and guitar work isn't enough to distract the listener from the bizarre mess of cheese and kitsch that are the lyrics. Gems such as "What if the world should die? And what if we could literally touch the sky?" from "What If" and "I need a vacation somewhere like in outerspace/I need to disclose my personality from this race" from "It Will Be I" are so unbelievably painful that, for some reason, I fell in love.

That's right, I love this band. After listening to their album over and over again, I realized that I'd grown attached to it. I can't explain it. Maybe it's their occasional sprinkling of french, their generous use of sound effects (thunderstorms, telephones ringing, seagulls, shotguns being cocked and blasted, cars zooming away, airplanes taking off) or their seemingly random genre-mixing (bluegrass, flamenco, blues and folk). Maybe it's the lead singer's vocal resemblance to Dave Mustaine of Megadeth.

Maybe I'm drawn by the fact that I can't tell whether or not the band knows how funny they come across. I mean, they have to. But looking at the band photo in the liner notes, their ass-length hairdos, leather vests and tattoos look pretty genuine. Maybe their image isn't a tongue-in-cheek parody, maybe they really mean it. Maybe that's their sin. It doesn't matter. I'm enjoying the mystery. That's my sin.

Survival of the illest
Live from 125
Def Jam Records

By MARK FUCELLA

All-star line-up, all-star label — both factors pushed aside my reservations about live hip hop albums. Cormega, Onyx, Def Squad and DMX all appear on the disc to perform their respective sets, with guest appearances by Method Man, The Lox and Foxy Brown. As you can see, Def Jam did not hesitate to throw all they had into their show at New York's Apollo. A cursory glance down the play list revealed many new tracks, but the lack of quality of the early joints had me shuttling around the disc.

My reservations with respect to live discs, unfortunately, were not diminished by the 125 album. The CD is plagued with recurring sound problems as the beat occasionally seems too quiet with respect to the lyrics. DMX's "Ruff Ryder Anthem" has noticeable problems as the track fluctuates until the engineer regains control of the boards. The production on this album has some issues; listing all the problems would be redundant and tiresome.

The energy of the artists is clear on the disc, but something is definitely lost in the transfer — especially when the artists rely on the audience to chant the chorus, which, in certain cases, results in a fractured flow. Despite my grievances there are some great sets, both Def Squad and DMX stick out with particularly strong performances. Def Squad rips through their songs without relent, moving across their spectrum of songs from "How High" with Method Man to "Full Cooperation." DMX, however, is given the last set and rightly so. His performance commands attention as he plays off the energy of the crowd, which, by this point, is out of control. My favourite track? It's "4,3,2,1" a DMX track featuring labelmates Method Man and Redman which showcases their skills and word play as they cut in and out of each other's verses. The Apollo show must have been unbelievable, but only makes for a mediocre album. The freestyles and manipulation of known tracks spice things up, but not enough to salvage the album. Unfortunately, there is no way to transfer the energy and power of a live show to disc, though Def Squad and DMX deserve an honourable mention. Until they can package the flow and vigour of the live show, a virtual impossibility, I'll be right there in the front row.

Healthy dose of MVN

this well-pull together piece. Unfortunately, Thursday night's audience wasn't really up to the task, but word has it that the performances on other evenings had the audience gleefully singing along.

Finally, my favourite skit of the evening was Surgery Night in Canada, performed by members of the Meds '99 class. The evening had been woefully short on tasteless surgical humour, and just as short, on short intestines. The mock-up of Hockey Night in Canada, with an unrehearsed Don Cherry commenting a match-up between a neurosurgeon and a vascular surgeon, was all that a MVN skit should be — funny, tasteless and loaded with sight gags.

Overall, I'd have to say that an evening with MVN, although not full high class talent, was an evening of hilarity well-spent. While not everyone was well-rehearsed, and there were a few awkward silences along the way, MVN, as always, proved to be well worth the time, especially considering the $15,000 it raised for charity.

Realistically though, how could I say otherwise, knowing that one of those dwarves in the finale skit may someday be removing my appendix?

Ultra Violet release a hit

MAGAZINE REVIEW

By RACHELLE VILLANUEVA

It was primarily out of curiosity that I went to the Ultra-Violet magazine launch at Alfie's last Saturday night. I wasn't even sure what was on the agenda, but an announcement in my first-year film class about the launch enticed the artist and writer in me. I couldn't find anyone to go to the event with me, but undaunted, I braved the rain and headed off to Alfie's alone. Feeling a little sheepish, I walked in and was relieved to see some familiar faces.

One thing I took note of was the atmosphere of the usually noisy, jam-packed pub. Alfie's felt like a different place that night. I walked in and was welcomed by a table stacked with issues of the magazine, with Silvia Schinck signing its cover as the "Coverstar." Tables lit with candles beckoned me, as did a wonderfully charming and quiet crowd which I confidently dubbed, in my head as a "slightly beatnik" crowd. Yes, I thought, artistic types like me — I was in my niche. It meant a lot that I attended the event alone and felt perfectly comfortable.

I found the words and images in the magazine to be inventive, beautiful and undeniably inspiring.

Sipping on a drink and reading the magazine while sitting at a candle-lit table at the "coffeshop-fied" Alfie's was a thoroughly enjoyable experience. I found the words and images in the magazine to be inventive, beautiful and undeniably inspiring.

The launch featured a showcase of writers, comprised mostly of Queen's students and alumni, reading both works published in the magazine and recently written works. A diverse array of individuals made their way on stage, took the mic and well — spilled their guts.

The material read by the poets, on the whole, was very touching. The poems shared were extremely personal, and having read in front of audiences myself, I empathized with the nervousness, courage and personal pride that manifested itself on stage with each reader.

It hardly mattered that they were amateurs — their honesty and talent made them truly inspiring. It made me feel good to witness fellow writers sharing their personal creations. Finally, I thought, an outlet for creative writers and artists on campus that we can all enjoy and take pride in.

After walking back home in the rain I sat at my desk and wrote and wrote and wrote.

I have no doubts whatsoever that both the magazine and the launch were well worth devoting my Saturday night to. After walking back home in the rain I sat at my desk and wrote and wrote and wrote.

The lights go out. The audience quiets to an excited murmur. Mist fills the catwalk drifting over the stage, hanging in the air like a storm. The music starts, filling each corner of the room, and drowning the audience's murmur. Suddenly, a beam of light, then another, a third, and finally a fourth slice the fog. The lights are splayed in every direction, and illuminate the mist, which shimmers in the glow. The lights begin to dance, swinging back and forth, pulsating with the music. The show begins.

Faux fur seemed to be a recurring theme in this show, obviously a stylish acquisition this winter.

There were two scenes featuring clothes from What'll I Wear, a downtown store which sells vintage clothing. This scene had a retro look featuring colourful and fun bellbottoms and butterfly collars. Perhaps the most striking clothes were the two smoking jackets; one long and navy and the other red and shorter. These were a unique touch to the show.

A white lacy dress with a layered, crinoline skirt, paired with sunglasses caught the audience's attention.

As well, there were two faux fur coats, one fitted and knee-length, and one short. Faux fur seemed to be a recurring theme in this show, obviously a stylish acquisition this winter.

Two other scenes in the show were conducted by Mod Shop, the one store I had never heard of. The premise of this store is fascinating. Located at 122 Princess Street, Mod Shop is a charitable project that supports the March of Dimes with all the proceeds made from the sale of the vintage clothing.

Again, during these two scenes the look was distinctively retro, and the clothes shown were unique and lively. Things like a white lacy dress with a layered, crinoline skirt, paired with sunglasses caught the audience's attention.

Neon, Willys and Trailhead were also featured, and each showed very similar clothes, including ski jackets, sunglasses, and flared jeans of varying shades. Cargo pants were also displayed repeatedly in varying cuts and colours. T.K.O., however, was the store that truly carried the show. There were three scenes displaying its clothes, all with varying styles.

The overall impression was a lot of shimmer and a lot of black and wine colours. There were things to fit every occasion, from club hopping clothes to outfits for the upcoming holiday season, including 11 holiday party dresses, all of which were stunning.

Ultimately, the show was a success. Not only was it enlightening, it was also entertaining. If the T.K.O. show was any indication, this winter's fashions should be hot enough to keep you warm and cozy!

iel SEGUNDO DUELO GRANDO de Misceláno! EL MÚSICO DEL NIÑO RAFFI CONTRA EL OTRA MÚSICO DEL NIÑO FRED PENNER

It's the second round of MISC's ongoing 'showdown' series. This week, the man behind The Cot Come Back (below left) takes on Baby Beluga's birther (below right). Feel the fire in the pens of Stefan Murray and Ken Butland as each attempts to make his childhood troubadour the victor. Two men have entered the ring... only one shall emerge.

RAFFI — THE ALL TIME, all transcending Sultan of children's music. An integral voice for music and compassion, his importance and preeminence cannot be questioned. Unless of course, you happen to be the MISC editor of The Queen's Journal and neglected to come up with a decent debate topic before your deadline. So now it's head to head, may the best children's musician win. And who has my esteemed colleague thrown in the ring to de-throne the undisputed heavy-weight? Is it Sheri Lewis and her hand-sheep being escorted to the canvas? Nope. Maybe the combined talents of Sharon, Lois and Bram in tag-team contest could manage to get a few rabbit punches and low blows to connect. Afraid not. The opposition has elected to send an unheralded super-flyweight amateur to go toe-to-toe with Raffi. For some unknown reason, Mr. Butland has chosen Fred Penner (career CBC car scraper) to drop the gloves with Raffi. What does Butland see in this mediocre never will-be? Does he share Fred's penchant for small children or is his own musical ability, or lack thereof, on par with Penner's? Either way, Penner isn't fit to tune Raffi's guitar strings. But, that's just my opinion. This is The Queen's Journal, it's Queen's students that matter.

Ask any student which children's songwriter and personality they remember and they all give you the same answer. Even if they can't tell you which one of their parents has recently acquired Alzheimers, they will all, without delay, utter the name Raffi. Try to find someone at this institution who was raised by Fred Penner. Unless they're some kind of Doogie Howser brain-child, no one here was young enough to experience that schtik stealing, talentless hack. So either Mr. Butland is organizing his argument for his 12-year old cousin or he's just an extremely adversarial dildo.

Although Ken's writing and arguments would indicate that his targeted audience has yet to experience toilet training, I place my X in column B. He's just arguing for the sake of arguing and clearly has no leg to stand on. I barely have to mention Raffi's two decade commitment to the education and entertainment of our young future to close this debate. I need only repeat my boy's name: Raffi, Raffi, R-A-F-F-I. The man doesn't even need a last name. But I suppose I should back my claims. In the past 24 years Raffi has released 12 record breaking albums, a best selling picture book series, recorded the timeless song "Baby Beluga," received the Order of Canada and has performed thousands of shows in North America and around the globe. He is a musical genius and humanitarian, a hybrid of Lennon and Ghandi; Penner can barely muster enough octaves to challenge ChumbaWumba.

And of course, Ken, knowing the futility of his arguments, will probably try to demean Raffi by calling him a sell-out. He'll try to convince whoever will listen that Raffi has abandoned his craft by releasing an autobiography and moving into the Adult Contemporary field. Then he'll claim that Penner has remained true to his musical vision. And in a way he's right. Over the few years that Penner has enjoyed limited success in this country, he has been extremely committed to a distinct style: Raffi's. From his imitation beard and clothing to his voice and chord progressions, Penner has become a Raffi clone, mimicking everything that made Raffi ground-breaking. In order for Penner to actually mature musically, he must wait for someone else to do it first and then shamelessly copy it. He'll probably release a swing album within the next six months.

So there you go, if you've already read this far, I suggest you stop now and see what Ken has to say, what creative way he'll try to spin himself out of an unwinnable argument, because I'm going to end this debate with a simple point. I'll enlighten you all with common knowledge. Raffi is the best there was, the best there is and the best there ever will be. Don't waste your time Butland, back a winner.

Stefan Murray never had to sit at the back of Raffi's school bus.

"The warmth and affection I feel from audiences is what really keeps me going, gives me a purpose. I count my blessings every day that I'm actually allowed to be an entertainer." — Fred Penner.

My heart beat like a little bunny. I shuffled my feet, but I really felt like using them to kick the shins of everyone that lay between myself and he who rocked my burgeoning young world. Less than a dozen steps from where I stood sat the man himself. A sultan attending to his bourgeois middle-class harem and their adoring children he was. A true musical genius.

FOLLOWING IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF Raffi the critics cried. As if another Raffi was a good idea. We needed another Raffi about as much as we needed another Richard Marx or a deep paper cut through that little flap of flesh under our tongues. No, the children's musical messiah the world was getting to know was no Raffi. Fred Penner was 20 times the man Raffi was: husband, father, and a true Canadian.

Ten albums, 12 videos, a cd-rom game, a nationally syndicated children's television show broadcast to more than 28 million North American homes, the Order of Canada award and one children's novel later, Penner has stayed true to his craft. His musical purity can be attributed to early concerns for his own sister. Diagnosed with Down's Syndrome, Penner learned guitar in order to entertain and comfort her. He continued his involvement with children with mental and physical disabilities through high school and into university, where he earned a degree in economics and psychology.

Says Mr. Penner: "I'm amazed what the power of music can do, and how deeply kids are affected by it. Once you realize that your songs are taken to heart, I believe you have to be responsible in how your music is presented, that the material is positive and sensitive in addressing real life through a child's eyes."

And positive and sensitive it was. Mr. Penner's music truly addressed the anxieties of my youth. He helped me confront my fears of ghosts, trolls and bumps in the night, to realize they were irrational, harmless. His songs expressed the special bond that existed between my parents and I, a bond that I learned to appreciate and cultivate in turn. For me, his work was instrumental in the growth of my understanding of the world, as it was for many children my age and continues to be for children today. Without Fred Penner I undoubtedly would not be the happy, well-adjusted person I am today. This brings us to Raffi, that insensitive, uncaring, egotistical bastard.

How did Raffi repay us, the children of eighties, for our tender, undying love and unflinching support? By turning his back on us and releasing, of all things, an album full of true adult contemporary fluff. The kind of thing you hear in a dentist's office or a grocery store. The shady business venture filled Raffi's pockets with cash and the eyes of youth with tears. It was as obvious then as it is now that Raffi cares nothing for the children — it's their parent's money he's been after all along. And the children experienced, many for the first time, how it felt to be used, betrayed and abandoned by someone they loved and trusted.

One could argue musical superiority with another of both were blue in the face, but Fred Penner's and Raffi's lives and musical careers contrast like day and night, good and evil. Fred Penner: musical crusader, defender of the minds and hearts of children; Raffi: musical Judas, corporate prostitute, and dream dasher.

The Journal's A&E editor Stefan Murray's obsession with Raffi is no surprise. Murray is admittedly one of the corporate music industry's cheapest whores. Send a CD or a fanpromotionally packaged his way and he'll gladly generate, a review that smacks forcefully of flattery and ceaseless fawning. Shameful. From what I can gather he was abandoned at an early age by both Raffi and his father, a hump-backed organ-grinder. This caused him to withdraw into a sad, try shell, and from that time on he worked ceaselessly to impress any and all musicians in hopes that they wouldn't abandon him too. Of course, this prevents him from making any objective judgements on music whatsoever. Ironic that he rose to the position of A&E editor this year, isn't it? Kind of sad and funny at the same time. Explains his attempt to defend Raffi anyway.

I approached the table, heart in my throat, and placed the cassette — as if an offering — with tiny, trembling hands, on the surface sprawling between us. He looked down at me, smiled, asked me my name, and in one sweeping motion scooped up the cassette, removed the tape, scrawled across the sleeve liner, replaced the tape and handed it back. As I walked away, hand safely locked in my mother's, I glanced back at him. I caught his eye, and he winked at me as if to say "everything's going to be okay, my boy, you're one special kid."

When I got settled into the car for the drive home, I finally looked at his autograph. "To my pal Kenny," it said. He'd put a little doodle of a smiling face beside it. I wept openly.

Ken Butland's vision of Utopia looks a lot like Fred Penner's Place.

SARAH'S RECIPE CORNER

Vegetable Pasta Sauce

The great thing about this recipe is that you can add or take away veggies at will (within reason, that is. I don't recommend adding say, cucumbers, but hey... you're the one eating it). I sometimes throw in some pitted black olives, sundried tomatoes, or fresh chopped swiss chard or spinach. If you have red wine handy, 1/2 a cup added to the sauce with the tomatoes adds considerably to the flavour.

For this recipe you'll need:

- 3 tbsp. Olive oil
- 2 cloves garlic
- 1 medium onion, chopped
- 6-7 mushrooms, sliced
- 1/2 red pepper, finely chopped
- 1 small zucchini, coarsely chopped
- 1 24 oz. can of whole or diced tomatoes (not pureed)
- 1/2 cup chopped fresh parsley or 1 tsp. dried parsley
- 1/2 cup chopped fresh basil or 1 tsp. dried basil
- salt and fresh ground pepper

The recipe calls for olive oil, the single most delicious oil in the world in my opinion. If you are not yet addicted to cooking with olive oil and I don't have any, I urge you to treat yourself to a bottle, which can be bought for $5-12, depending on brand name and quality.

1. Smash the garlic cloves with the flat side of a large knife, and discard the skins.
2. In a medium-sized pot or a large frying pan (I prefer a teflon frying pan), darkly brown the crushed cloves in the olive oil on all sides and discard them.
3. Add the onion, mushrooms and red pepper. Brown them well (this is key in making flavourful sauce).

4. Add the zucchini and cook all the veggies together, stirring, for about three minutes.
5. Add the can of tomatoes. If they are whole, cut them up while still in the can with a knife, then add.
6. Cook on medium-high heat stirring diligently for about 10 minutes, or until sauce is thick. Add the herbs, pepper and salt. Cook for one minute.
7. Serve over pasta cooked al dente.

*Finishing touches: If possible, serve fresh bread with olive oil in a shallow dish as an appetizer, tossed salad, and a glass of wine with this meal.

Sarah Le May lives to cook... and cooks to live.

LifeSci cuts force reductions?

BY JONATHAN TINNEY

Second-year Life Science students are anxiously awaiting decisions on a possible reduction in their program enrolment. Financial constraints, increased class size and policy changes may mean as many as 65 students will be forced to find another major at the end of this year.

This is not the first time life science students have faced the threat of enrolment reductions. Last March students were warned that the implementation of an academic cut-off for '01 life science students entering second year was being considered. At the time, the administration did not go ahead with the enrolment cuts, but now the cuts are once again under consideration.

The current problems are rooted in an administrative change made last year. In the past life science students were able to choose from two separate but similar streams, a major stream and a subject of specialization stream. Students could choose between the more flexible major stream, which offered a greater proportion of electives and less laboratory time, and the more intensive laboratory-centred SSP stream.

Last year, the major stream was cancelled to all students after the class of '00. This directly affected the class of '01, as they could no longer choose between the two streams. The life science class of '01 is also one of the largest in the history of the program. There are only available resources for 160 laboratory spots, meaning 65 students in a class of 225 will be unable to continue.

"Currently we have these rules in the course calendar. Students must attain a 65 per cent in core courses in second year and have a 70 per cent average in first year," said Dr. M. A. Joneja, associate dean of life science. "As well, it also states that priority will be given to students with higher grades."

"Some students will be unable to continue because they did not meet the first two requirements," Joneja continued, "in my best estimates only 15 to 20 or so of the extra 65 will be cut by academic standing."

Despite these figures, some individuals feel the decision comes at an unfair time. "There are concerns about the fact that even students of high standing who were cut-out will be at a disadvantage in other programs due to a lack of prerequisites," said Kathy Marshall, life science academic president.

These concerns were reiterated by some students. "My options are definitely limited, I took a big chance staying in [life science]. I considered applying to Phys-Ed or Biology but the second year courses are the ones I wanted to take, so I took the gamble," said Matthew Gallupe Life Sci '01.

"I had a lot of choices coming out of high-school, I came to Queen's because

Students vie for biochem spots

BY QUEEN'S JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

Many first and second-year Queen's biochemistry students are worried they may be unable to complete an honours degree, after receiving a letter from the biochemistry department earlier this month regarding enrolment problems in laboratory courses in the department's honours program.

The letter, written by Albert Clark, professor and head of the biochemistry department, was intended to make first and second-year biochemistry students aware of increasing enrolment and laboratory space pressures in the upper years of the program and advise "them to make sure their marks are up there," said Clark.

Because of budget constraints which Clark called, beyond the department's control, it is not possible to provide more than approximately 48 laboratory spaces in BCHM 317, a core course in the biochemistry subject of specialization program. According to Clark, exclusion from the course also leads unavoidably to exclusion from the SSP program, "and students in this position may have some difficulty in finding a satisfactory alternative degree program."

Although enrolment in the third-year course has been limited in past years, this is the first year that Clark has sent a letter to students about the issue. "We've always had a limited number of spots," he said. However, this year Clark decided to send students a special notification because this year's increase in the number of second-year biochemistry students suggests that demand for the course will be higher this year than in previous years.

As a result, students' academic standing will be increasingly important

Server problems delay Journal

BY JOCELYN LAPORTE

A system-wide shut down, possibly caused by viruses, resulted in a publication delay of last Friday's Queen's Journal. The viruses included one "form A" virus, an "antiexec" virus and one called "unashamed." The third one is believed to have caused most of the serious damage.

"We don't know if it was necessarily the virus that caused it or if it was only a mitigating factor in the crash," said Tara Mansbridge, co-editor-in-chief of The Journal. "We have been out three and half days and we are only partially up now," she said.

The system first began going down at around 8 p.m. Wednesday night and crashed completely by 11 p.m. "We made the decision that the paper wasn't going out at about 11:30 a.m. Thursday," said Mansbridge.

"I think the thing that's most disturbing to me is that we were not backed up," said Mansbridge. "We are supposed to get backed up every night at 12 a.m. by ADSM [the ITS backup system]," she added. "If it hasn't been working for us, how many other things hasn't it been working for?"

A similar network for the Alma Mater Society exists but for security reasons The Journal has historically opted to remain on a separate network.

None of the files on The Journal server have been backed up since September 18. As a result, 15 back issues of the newspaper have been permanently lost in the crash, as have The Journal's account billings.

"I was never involved with the setting up of the server," said Bill Joslin of Queen's Information and Technology services. He explained that the systems administrator should have been responsible for checking that the back-up system was operating properly.

"I started the restoration [on Saturday] and I'm going to go back tomorrow to show the administrator how to check the back-up system," said Joslin.

Three computers in the upper production area were finally restored late Saturday afternoon.

The problems were the net result of a combination of factors, said Joslin. The Journal "ran into a combination of bad things happening at once," he added. "The odds of getting a virus and at the same time having the system crash are very slim," he said, "plus, half way

Queen's launches capital campaign

BY STEPHANIE CARVIN

Queen's university will undertake a new capital campaign this year in order to "continue to attract the best and brightest students and faculty," said George Hood, vice-principal (advancement) during a presentation to the university senate last Friday.

The campaign, with the slogan "Preparing Leaders and Citizens for a Global Society," hopes to raise approximately $450 million dollars.

"We don't have a goal," Hood said, indicating that if the campaign set a goal, and it was met, there would be pressure to end the campaign from the community and other charities who would also be looking for donations even though the university could possibly get more donations. The campaign will cost approximately 10 per cent of the total new revenues raised.

A report outlining the campaign stated that there are many external and internal factors that are favourable to beginning a campaign at this time. These include increasing partnerships with business, Queen's reputation, trends of increasing voluntarism and philanthropy in society in general, and recent tax legislation changes which make giving more attractive.

Hood said government grants are down $30 million if you factor in inflation and the rise of tuition. The last major capital campaign ended five years ago although there has been mini-campaigns since then, such as the fund-raising campaign for the Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

"The funding for post-secondary education has declined," said Principal Bill Leggett, who indicated he'd like to see the campaign succeed "rather than ask students to pay more money for tuition." The chair of the campaign will be Bob Peterson, the CEO of Imperial Oil.

From May 1997 to December 1998 Queen's has been involved in the planning phase. From late 1998 to the end of 2000 is the "quiet" phase which will focus on solidifying the top 50 or more gifts valued at over $1 million each. This, according to the campaign outline, will demonstrate momentum, generate enthusiasm and attract more donations. The next phase is the "public" phase of the campaign which will emphasize use

An article about the referenda in the November 13 issue should have stated that 49.2 per cent of students voted against the ENGERAMA fee.

An article about gender degrees in the last issue should have stated that science degrees do not have a gender-neutral option. The Journal regrets the errors.

Laptops mandatory for Comm '03 class

BY LIANNE ELLIOTT

Renovations around campus are already underway in preparation for the arrival of next year's first-year Commerce students, the first Commerce class for whom owning laptop computers will be mandatory.

Beginning this fall, classrooms in Dunning Hall have been re-designed with internet hook-up ports available at each desk. According to Tom Anger, chair of the Commerce program, these hook-up sites will allow students with laptops "to take part in multi-media presentations," giving them the ability to access and download slides, graphs and notes relevant to lectures.

Max Vo, Comm '02, already finds having a laptop useful this year. "I find my laptop very useful in class," he said, "and I think they're essential to my program."

More recently, hook-up ports have also been added to the Dunning study room (room nine), providing Internet access to each individual study area.

Dunning Hall is not the only Queen's building to adapt to the new Commerce Laptop Program, as well as to the growing number of laptop computer owners in other faculties.

New to Stauffer Library, Douglas Library and the Law Library are active network ports allowing laptop users to log-on while studying. There are 21 new hook-up sites in both Stauffer and Douglas Library as well as 14 in the Law Library. To access the Internet through these ports, users must be Queen's students, with a Queen's password and userid.

In addition to these recent renovations, Queen's University also plans on building internet access ports in both the Macintosh-Corry Hall study room and cafeteria.

Along with the increase in internet hook-up sites, which will be of practical benefit to the next year's Commerce freshmen, Queen's also hopes to aid the Comm '03 class financially.

Queen's Business School plans to set aside 400,000 dollars in bursaries as a means of aiding future Commerce students who cannot afford to purchase or lease their own laptop computer, said Anger.

Also, according to Anger, in order to allow students a choice in price and quality, "laptops will not be issued to students... and bundled with tuition." Next year's commerce students will instead be allowed to purchase their own computers, based on a list of required features provided by the business school. Independent buying will give students the opportunity to seek out the most competitive prices for themselves.

However, if they desire, commerce students will also have the option to purchase or lease a laptop computer from Queen's.

Anger believes that, despite the initial cost of purchasing a computer, implementing laptops into the commerce program will be of great benefit to upcoming commerce students. "It will provide required computer skills... giving Queen's commerce students a competitive advantage over other schools in the job market," he said.

Many commerce students see the eventual benefits of the Commerce Laptop Program.

"I think it's a good idea but they need to get the problems under control," said Sarah Muir, Comm '01, when referring to people e-mailing and using ICQ during class.

Mark Landry, Comm '02 further noted that to be of benefit laptops will need to "be used consistently in class."

Queen's receives $2.5 million grant

BY JOCELYN LAPORTE

Earlier this week, David Johnson, Ontario Minister of Education and Training, announced the implementation of a new grant program which will see $29 million distributed to Ontario Universities during the next few years.

Eleven universities, including Queen's, along with the Ontario College of Art and Design, will share the Fair Funding grant. These universities will be required to use the funding to hire additional professors for undergraduate courses. Queen's will receive approximately $2.5 million over the next three years.

"We will see a modest increase in the number of faculty... distributed on the basis of plans put forward by the [departments]," said David Turpin, Queen's vice-principal (academics).

In a press release, Johnson stated, "By targeting the Fair Funding Grant to increase the number of teachers at the undergraduate level and to enhance their professional development programs, this government has shown its commitment to Ontario students."

The establishment of grant program was originally announced by Paul Martin, Minister of Finance, in the federal government's last budget.

Turpin said university officials planned its budget this year with the expectation of incorporating the funds into their revenue. "This is not new money, it has already been budgeted," Turpin said. The university will receive $860,000 from the Ontario government this year, he added.

"This is not new money, it has already been budgeted."

— David Turpin, vp (academics)

Johnson's announcement came as "a combination of satisfaction and relief," said Principal Bill Leggett. "We are pleased the money has come through because it was built into our budget."

This additional funding will not come anywhere near to making up for the money lost as a result of the government cut-backs over the last three years, said Turpin. Relative to the cut-backs, the grant represents "a

Speaker denounces mistreatment of prostitutes

BY HILARY CLARK

Society needs to realize that prostitution is not a lifestyle, it is a job. This was the central message of a speech given by a prostitute to a crowd of approximately 400 on Monday night.

Valerie Scott said decriminalization of prostitution is the only way for those in the sex trade to continue to work, and not to be seen as criminals, but as working members of society.

Also speaking with Scott was Debbie Brock, a professor of sociology at Trent University and author of Making Work, Making Trouble: Prostitution as a Social Problem. Brock first met Scott in 1986 while engaging in political activism in support of women working as prostitutes.

Brock echoed Scott's sentiment that attitudes towards prostitution need to be changed.

"When I first started learning about prostitution it was included in the sociology of deviation, meaning it was something bad, something against society," said Brock.

Scott, a spokesperson for the Canadian Organization for the Rights of Prostitutes, has been very active in the Toronto area, where she helped open a drop-in centre for prostitutes.

In her speech, she argued that her choice of work is the same as any other career choice an individual would make. Scott said she knew she wanted to be a prostitute from an early age and turned her first date when she was 11, but didn't become a regularly working prostitute until she was 24. She said she enjoys her job, including the money and the hours. "Most people work eight hours a day. I work about two," she said.

Scott, who has a

23-year old son, said working as a prostitute is something she doesn't think she could ever give up. "Even if I got a so-called 'normal' job, I think I would go out and work a couple of nights anyway," she said.

Scott told the audience she has never sold her body. "My body remains intact. I have never sold my body for anybody. People who sell their bodies get married and change their names and have babies," she said.

"Prostitutes are not psychopaths," said Scott. "We are your sisters, mothers and aunts."

Scott said society must not accept the mistreatment of prostitutes, but treat it like racism. "Violence against prostitutes is acceptable... because [prostitution] is illegal in our society," said Scott. "Men are afraid of a woman who controls her own sexuality, that is why men have made it illegal."

"Violence against prosti-tutes] has to be stopped, now," she said.

The speakers also attempted to dispel some myths that surround prostitutes, including the common one that they are vessels of disease. "When was the last time you had an STD check? Mine was last Thursday," said Scott. The discussion, held at the BioSciences Complex, was put on by the Ontario Public Interest Research Group.

New computer virus invades privacy

BY RENEE HUANG

Computer users and e-mail junkies beware. Queen's Information Technology Services is warning students and staff about a new virus that enables a perpetrator to break into a person's computer via e-mail.

Called Nerbus, the program is sent as an attachment onto regular e-mail messages or through ICQ, a popular Internet communication software package.

"Friends send it to friends," said Andy Hooper, systems administrator at ITS. People receiving the attachment open it up and the virus then attaches itself to their system. "It takes advantage of Windows '95 and '98," Hooper said, by acting "sort of like a remote control." He added that UNIX, the system which runs Qlink, is safe from the virus.

"Once you open it [the attachment], it will install itself to your computer and allow anyone with the same program to come in and do what they want," Hooper explained.

Geoff Leboldus, systems programmer specialist at ITS, identified two parts of Nerbus: the server, which is the invading virus, and the client, "used by, in this case, the villain" to manipulate the victim's computer. The client enables the sender to "run the program and look for people who are infected," Leboldus continued.

The sender can then access the victim's computer when it is turned on, leaving ghost messages, opening and closing CD-ROM doors, deleting files, controlling the mouse movements and even shutting the computer down from an external source.

"A lot of the stuff we see is joking between two friends screwing around on their machines," said Leboldus. "Some is fairly clear serial harassing."

Hooper said the virus is spreading through many university systems. At Queen's, it seems to be predominantly circulating among ResNet and Queen's @ Home users. Leboldus added that ITS has seen some on-campus public

Cobain's death a conspiracy, author suggests

By REBECCA STELTER

On Tuesday evening, Ian Halperin, author of Who Killed Kurt Cobain?, discussed the unanswered questions surrounding popular musician Kurt Cobain's death. The presentation was organized by the AMS Campus Activities Commission and the Queen's Entertainment Agency.

Halperin is an award-winning journalist currently touring North America to discuss his book. He was also a close personal friend of Cobain, deceased lead singer of the popular group Nirvana.

For the majority of his two-hour lecture, held in Etherington Hall, Halperin discussed in great detail the reasons why he believes the death of Cobain, an incredibly successful and influential musician, was no suicide. He also argued that Courtney Love, Cobain's widow, was somehow involved in the musician's death.

Halperin's presentation Tuesday evening used both audio and video aids. He presented video clips of interviews that he had conducted in his investigation into the death of Kurt Cobain. Halperin also showed slides which included photos of Cobain, Love, and their respective bands. Also presented were representations of police reports, Cobain's (alleged) suicide note and fingerprints, which were not, Halperin stated, on the gun that Cobain supposedly used to shoot himself.

Halperin's novel has resulted in many threats by Love and her attorneys, he said. Halperin insisted he is not accusing anyone of anything in his book, but merely "letting the facts speak for themselves."

He said it is important that fans of Nirvana and Cobain are aware of what might have not been a suicide, due to the fact that there have been 68 copycat teenage suicides in Cobain's name.

Halperin said his experience as an editor of the student newspaper at Concordia University, where his interest in investigative reporting began. He recalled "being thrown in jail for not divulging the names of sources" in the 1980s. He then worked for numerous media including the CBC and The Montreal Gazette but he found that "they just wanted to put out a product every day," and capitalize "the news, he said, using examples like the O.J. Simpson case and the innumerable lapses of Bill Clinton to support his statement. For this reason, Halperin said he was proud that he "got out at an early age" and moved on to music.

Music is what Halperin occupies himself with when he's not writing books or doing promotional tours, he said. He has also written a similar type of exposé novel about Canadian singer Celine Dion. Halperin is currently doing multimedia work, which combines music, dance and poetry. He finished the evening with a video clip of himself playing saxophone in this multimedia group, "just to show you the other side of me," he said.

Ian Halperin discusses questions surrounding Kurt Cobain's mysterious death.

THANK YOU FOR YOUR PARTICIPATION

Recently, 1600 randomly selected students at Queen's received a voluntary survey from the Institute for Social Research on the costs of attending university for Ontario students. This survey is an important step in understanding financial issues that Queen's students are facing and will help to inform decisions about policies and practices impacting Queen's Student Aid programs in the future.

Thanks to all those students who have completed and returned surveys. If you have not completed your survey, we encourage you to please do so today.

it had a unique program. I want to take microbiology, and I can only get that in life sci," said Michelle Gauthier, Life Sci '01. "Now I'm faced with possibly going into a program I don't want. If I had known this before I probably would have gone to UBC."

A few possible solutions have been proposed such as charging a lab fee to all students, but Joneja encouraged students to be patient. "There is very little we can do right now in the way of planning. We have made an application for additional funds, so once the budget is made up we will know where we stand," he said.

Budget decisions are made in December and students should know the outcome upon returning to school in January. In the mean time, faculty and peer counsellors have been made available to life science students to help with course and program selection. The life science executive encourages students to contact them with any questions or comments at liscdsc@asus.queensu.ca.

of person to person solicitation methods and mass solicitation programs for community gifts.

Four major goals have been outlined for the campaign that focus on attracting students internationally and nationally, strengthening the Queen's environment to "stimulate exceptional research and teaching," increasing the number of programs offered at Queen's, and broadening the Queen's environment to help students acquire life and leadership skills. Specific objective examples include upgrading athletic facilities, creating a student scholarship endowment fund, a new chemistry building, an Asian languages program, a biodiversity center, multi-media labs, student initiatives funds and an Arts education centre.

Leggett said his role would be that of "cheerleader" for the campaign through "working with the campaign cabinet on major gifts and certainly a large role in communicating the vision of the campaign. It will certainly be a very large part of my life for the next few years." Leggett would like to see students become aware of the campaign and "how it will help future generations." He also hoped that students would contribute to the campaign. "I hope that students will understand the importance of contributing no matter how small," he said. Leggett has begun to advertise the campaign to students through the campus media in large back page advertisements.

Campus Security updates Two more incidents raise concern

Saturday, November 21

At about 7:30 p.m., an elderly female, who is confined to a wheelchair, was attacked in her Beverly Street home by a male suspect who had come to her door requesting to use her phone. The victim suffered a blow to the head and non-life threatening injuries.

Police are seeking a white male suspect, 30-40 years, of medium height and build, wearing a dark jacket and a dark tuque which was pulled down to his eyes. This male may have loitered in the Union/Beverly/Queen's Crs. Area prior to this incident. He fled the victim's residence on foot.

This information was provided by Kingston City Police — anyone with information concerning this incident or suspect is asked to call Kingston Police (549-4660) or Crime Stoppers (634-8477).

This crime took place in the neighbourhood of Queen's University. All staff, faculty, and students are advised to keep their doors locked and to use caution when answering the door, particularly at night.

If someone asks to use your phone, direct them towards the nearest pay phone or place the call yourself if an emergency. Do not let anyone into your home unless you know who they are.

Monday, November 23

At 10:40 a.m. at Botterell Hall, the building's Administrator contacted Campus Security to report he'd just been approached by a woman who suspected there was a man in one of the women's washrooms. The Administrator stayed outside the washroom, ensuring no one entered or exited, until the Security Supervisor arrived.

The Supervisor and Administrator entered the washroom and confronted a man attempting to hide in one of the stalls. When City Police were contacted to identify the male, he fled the area and was chased through the building, outside to Barrie Street and eventually was lost inside Kingston General Hospital.

KGH Security was notified, a description of the suspect was passed, and they began a search of the hospital. During the chase, the suspect had verbally threatened the Supervisor and later threatened both pursuers with a 3' piece of wood.

At about 11:25 a.m., the Security Supervisor met with City Police and Building Administrator just as the suspect appeared again, heading towards McLaughlin Hall. The KPS Officer apprehended the suspect and charged him with Trespassing.

Campus Security later determined that the man had been served with a NOP (Notice of Prohibition) by our department in 1993. Kingston City Police reported that this individual has a violent criminal past, including weapons offenses, manslaughter, and others.

He will now be charged with Trespassing, two counts of Breach of Probation, Uttering Threats, Assault, and possibly Attempted Break and Enter (suspect had attempted to force entry into a building on Barrie Street during the foot chase).

Most cases 'benign'

computers affected by Netbus. "We've known about it for some time," said Leboldus.

"It's only been recently we've had what we'd call a plague."

— Geoff Leboldus, ITS systems programmer specialist

So far, most incidences of the virus have been "relatively benign," Hooper said, although ITS has dealt with two incidents in which Netbus was used for harassment purposes.

Leboldus cited another virus called Back Orfus as the first in a new breed of computer viruses or remote administration tools that allows the sender to control a receiver's computer from an external source.

"Back Orfus was announced by a bunch of crackers called Cult of the Dead Cow," explained Leboldus. He intentionally distinguished between "hackers" and what he calls "crackers," explaining that, "Hackers tends to mean they're competent."

"It's only been recently we've had what we'd call a plague," he said.

One of the maddening aspects of the virus is its chameleon-like ability to exist in a number of forms. "It comes under various names," said Hooper. "[The senders] try to disguise what it does."

Leboldus named several program names Netbus may appear as, including patch.exe, explore.exe, system.exe, fun.exe and yoda.exe.

Both Hooper and Leboldus had advice to computer users to protect against the virus.

"Never run attachments that you get through ICQ or e-mails without scanning [them] first" with a virus checker, cautioned Leboldus. He added that many people can pass the virus on without knowing it.

"If you have received a program [through an attachment] or if you use ICQ... and have seen strange messages popping up on screen, you should call the ITS help desk," Hooper explained. A program called Netbuster is available for free to those encountering difficulties with computer viruses.

"[Netbuster] can be set up to tell where connections are coming from," said Hooper. The program traces the source and documents the user's activities for ITS programmers to identify.

While incidents to date have been fairly innocent, Hooper and Leboldus are adamant about harassment issues. "If it's potentially problematic, the Criminal Code will be brought in," said Leboldus.

very, very small investment," he said.

Leggett echoed Turpin's comments that the funding was minimal in relation to recent cutbacks. "We are talking about $2 million over three years, when we lost approximately $15.7 million," he said, adding, "There is a big shortfall between those two numbers."

Universities qualifying for the grant must develop a five-year plan outlining the number of annual increases in faculty members and provide details on projects aimed at improving the quality of teaching.

Some of these projects include enhanced professional development programs. As well, confirmation of the successful implementation of this plan will be required for institutions to maintain the funding on a permanent basis.

through the reinstallation there were problems with the hard drive." Joslin also explained that the server's back-up system was not being regularly checked to ensure the information was in fact being backed up.

There are a number of possible routes that the virus could have taken to find its way onto the system. It could have been brought in on a disk and worked its way onto the server or it could have been already on the server and just finally had an effect on the system, Mansbridge explained.

"One of the most frustrating things about this is that we don't know. We don't know when things are going to be fixed, we don't know exactly what went wrong and we don't know how to fix it," said Mansbridge.

She explained that the server problem was a new circumstance that even the computer engineers had never seen before. At one point a call was even placed to a Novell engineer. In addition, no one is sure why the system is still not totally working.

"This is only the second time in 12 years I've had to recover a system from scratch."

— Bill Joslin, Information Technology Services

Joslin confirmed that the possibility of both things happening at once was not common. "This is only the second time in 12 years I've had to recover a system from scratch," he said.

The delay in publication has cost The Journal the loss of three ads, and accompanying loss of revenue. "Considering we're coming out three days late, we're very fortunate to have only lost three advertisers," said Keith Gerein, the other co-editor of The Journal. To produce today's delayed edition of The Journal, section editors had to share the only three working computers on The Journal network.

There is no operation on the other dozen computers, the printer connection is unreliable and the server itself is shaky, said Mansbridge. As well, The Journal, had to be hand-delivered this morning.

"It's been very frustrating, every time we seem to take a step forward in getting this thing solved something else seems to go wrong," said Gerein. "I would have assumed that at this point things would have been up and running again... it's going to take quite a bit more time and quite a bit more work before we are back to where we were," he added.

"It's kind of a feeling of helplessness," said Gerein. "Because few of us here are computer whizzes and even those who are can't seem to figure it out... things have to get done and you don't have the power to fix things," he said.

Student reaction to Friday's missing edition of The Journal was mixed. "I thought it was weird," said Sue Henry, ArtsSci '99. "It didn't disrupt my life at all," she said, adding "perhaps if The Journal's system was under the AMS network it could have been prevented." "It's no big deal, as long as it comes out at some point, I'll read it," said Lauren Sukerman, ArtsSci '00.

$5 million in funding continues research in sexual dysfunctions

BY RENÉE HUANG

A Queen's based company was recently awarded a $5 million investment to continue research into new treatments for sexual dysfunction.

"The money allows us to significantly advance our products," said Jim Banting, vice-president of operations and business development at Vaxis.

Vaxis is working on creating treatment approach with the potential to halt the progression of the disorder rather than simply treat it.

Michael Adams, one of the founding researchers of the company, hopes the funds will allow research into the underlying physiology, prevention and restoring normal functioning rather than treating symptoms.

Vaxis Therapeutics Corp. is the cooperative venture and vision of Queen's researchers Adams, Jeremy Heaton, and Banting.

"Basically Vaxis is a Queen's start-up company generated from Queen's research," said Adams, Queen's professor of pharmacology and toxicology, and vice-president of development and research for Vaxis.

Heaton is a professor in the department of urology and Banting was one of Adam's PhD students who graduated last year.

"The research that I do revolves around control of blood vessels," said Adams. "One day Jeremy walked through my door," and asked him to be a collaborator on a project he was looking to start. "He was convinced it was a neat opportunity," Adam continued. For Adam, this was an "opportunistic slide over" and a chance to integrate into a specific branch of vascular research.

The three had worked for eight or nine years, funded by Queen's technology transfer arm, PARTEQ, a group responsible for "recognizing university researchers have always had good ideas," said Adams.

He said ParTEq helps researchers write business plans and find funds, and generally encourages researchers to take new initiatives to commercialize their projects.

"ParTEq decided the best way to commercialize [the product] was to package it in the form of a company," said Banting.

"You're taking a research proposal and turning it into a business plan," he continued, a prospect that is often intimidating and overwhelming to someone who knows little about business.

"We're in a very hot market," said Adams, who said a conservative estimate in the erectile dysfunction market is projected at $4 billion by the year 2003.

Adams said viable cures to erectile dysfunction are on the horizon.

"We're still at the stage where we're testing," he said. Both Adams and Banting said the new funds will be used to hire additional graduate students, and bring jobs to Kingston.

Because some Vaxis researchers, such as Adams, also are Queen's professors, the $5 million is beneficial to Queen's. "The nice thing is it benefits the equipment supply [at Queen's]," said Adams. Funds from Vaxis inadvertently bring additional equipment and money to Queen's through researchers who bridge over into Queen's.

Relieve exam stress

BY TARYN WEBB

With exams approaching, the stresses and strains of studying are beginning to affect the Queen's student body.

"Physical exercise is always a good outlet [for stress]," offered Comm '01 student Drew Marshall, "and I find that music soothes the savage beast."

Jenn Durden from Sci '02 said, "I usually take a few hours to relax and watch a movie."

For advice that is more concrete, Queen's Health, Counselling and Disability Services, located on the ground level of the St. Lawrence building, offers a number of workshops and pamphlets on how to handle student stress and better prepare for exams.

HCDS Director Mike Condra said that the number of students who require their services fluctuate throughout the year, and that recently those numbers have been "down on the health side." Now, however, Condra said they are starting to go back up again, although he "wouldn't want to make a direct link between exam stress and student sickness."

Learning Strategies Counsellor, Elspet Christie explained that although Student Counselling consistently receives inquiries regarding study tips and stress management techniques, "there are certainly increased numbers this time of year."

Christie said, "[stress management] is not rocket science, but it's something that many students need to be reminded of." Christie offered these tips to students experiencing stress at this time of year:

* Recognise the symptoms of stress.

Eliminate distractions, which hamper your study habits and your personality.

* Deal with the physical symptoms of stress. Keeping yourself in good humour, exercising, and getting enough sleep will relax you and make your study time more effective.

* Relieve exam anxiety. Organise a study schedule and follow it, leaving time for relaxation.

* Do not learn new material the night before. This will cause you to become nervous before the exam. Focus on what you know.

* Do not study on the way to the exam. This will also cause you to become nervous and anxious. Also, arrive no earlier than 10 minutes before the exam so as not to be disheartened by the uncertainty of others.

* During the exam, breathe deeply and read through the exam at least twice before beginning. Allot a certain amount of time per question according to the marking scheme and move on when that time is up.

* After the exam. Do something to reward yourself and to clear your mind.

A workshop entitled "Study Tips" will be held on December 8. As well, the already filled Multiple Choice Exam Workshop on December 1 will be repeated on December 9. Christie urges students to call the Student Counselling Service's 24-hour line at 545-2893 if they are interested in either of these workshops, or if they would like to receive individual counselling. Students can also drop by and see counsellors daily from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and on Monday evenings.

60 Minutes to live

Television may be inundated with images of people dying, but no human being's life should end as a television event viewed by millions. The recent airing of the killing of Thomas Youk of Michigan on CBS's 60 Minutes may have crossed the line between performing a public service and turning a man's death into a public spectacle. Either way, the decision to air the video of Dr. Jack Kevorkian injecting lethal drugs into a consenting Youk has thrown the media into a sea of moral confusion over the limits of what is acceptable coverage.

Mr. Youk. It is unfortunate that Kevorkian felt the need to martyr a man's dignity in order to draw attention to how society deprives others of a peaceful death by refusing them legally sanctioned assisted suicide. It is also absurd, however, that the same legal system that defines Kevorkian's actions as criminal, cannot convince a jury or a judge to convict him, despite four trials. Kevorkian's actions are equally to blame on a government that has ignored this apparent contradiction between its laws and its convictions for years.

Crime or not, seeing an individual put to death on a popular Sunday night television show did cross the line and probably offended as much as it shocked the public.

Crime or not, seeing an individual put to death on a popular Sunday night television show may indeed have crossed the line and probably offended as much as it shocked the public. Of course, shocking images and content draw a large TV audience, as the Nielsen ratings for this broadcast of 60 Minutes demonstrate. The network's and 60 Minutes' complicity in choosing to air the video should not be overlooked; they both stood to benefit considerably from the decision. Even with six CBS affiliates declining to air the show, 15.6 million households tuned in for Mr. Youk's death. Although CBS News defended the show as a contribution to an important national debate, some critics have accused the show of being manipulated by Kevorkian to serve his own ends.

Regardless of CBS's motives, however, the airing of the video on national TV is an opportunity to stir public debate and prompt government legislation on an important issue. It would be unfortunate if this issue was left to be resolved in a courtroom when Kevorkian is tried for homicide instead of with sensible legislation. In the meantime, 60 Minutes and the rest of the news media should be more diligent that their reporting does not go beyond commentary and analysis, and become news itself.

Dr. Kevorkian, a retired pathologist whose name has become synonymous with assisted suicide and euthanasia, brought the footage to 60 Minutes in an attempt to force the hand of a recalcitrant government. Despite the pressing need to establish guidelines for when assisted suicide is acceptable, governments have stayed away from enacting legislation for what is a contentious issue in both the U.S. and Canada. Kevorkian and other advocates of passive euthanasia have exhausted the normal channels for effecting change in the legal system. In the absence of legal alternatives, Kevorkian chose to use the medium of television to force the system to take a stand on what he and many others consider a humane and dignified end to suffering. While many sympathize with his cause and his dedication (Kevorkian has vowed to starve himself if convicted), it is not as easy to reconcile these beliefs with the decision to air Mr. Youk's last minutes on national television. It is hard to imagine a less dignified or private death than Television has brought back murder into the home — where it belongs.

I don't want to wait

Two weeks ago today, Michel Trudeau, the youngest son of former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, drowned after being swept into Lake Kokanee by an avalanche. Michel, 23, was a marine biologist who had graduated from Dalhousie University. Ignoring the call of an office job upon graduation, Michel got a job as a ski-lift operator and volunteer ski patrolter.

On Remembrance Day, Michel and five friends drove to Kokanee Provincial Park for a back-country skiing adventure. The trip was cut short however, when, two days later, Michel's unexpected death occurred.

Michel was a nature lover and an 'outdoors person.' Shouldn't he have known better or prepared himself more for a sport, which is considered dangerous and is known to have death lurking around each peak of the mountain?

Michel could not foresee that heavy and wet snow would fall on the Kokanee Glacier. In case of an avalanche, he had transceivers, poles to probe the snow and shovels to dig himself out. So was he not prepared? Prepared for an avalanche, yes. Prepared for death, no. Death can be unanticipated and premature for everyone — which is why life must be lived to the fullest every day.

As students, we feel that we are invincible, that our university bubble will protect us from the evils of the world around us. Unfortunately, this is not so.

Like every other living creature, we are as susceptible to death as anyone else. I don't know if we as students think life is eternal because we can't see human suffeting in downtown Princess Street through the fog of expensive Queen's leather jackets, or because, as students, we are admittedly uneducated on global news which informs the general public of suffering and death.

What worries me is that students are always waiting to teach the next stage of life for "real life" to really begin. As young children in public school, we think life will start in high school. In high school, life will get interesting in post-secondary education. Even now that we are here, I repetitively hear that people can't wait to graduate to start their life.

University is not an intermittent waiting period for life to begin. For most of us, our life began over twenty years ago — from the moment we ate conscious of it we should start living it. I don't believe that it is possible to live every day like it is your last, but it is possible to live every day to its fullest. Take a stand and from this day on, say that you will live your life for you — volunteer, change your image, make amends in a friendship, travel or even something as simplistic as vowing to never make your bed again. Do whatever makes you happy because no one can live your life for you.

I'm not preaching, but rather suggesting that you take advantage of the holiday spirit — for yourself. Life is sweet, precious and unfortunately sometimes too short.

Michel Trudeau died doing what he loved — skiing in nature at its rawest form with his friends. If life has to end, shouldn't it be at your optimum happiness with no regrets?

OPINIONS

Marks-ism: the pressure to perform

YOUR PARENTS AREN'T the only ones asking to see your report card these days. Presently, any post-graduate path chosen by students makes use of academic transcripts when assessing the qualifications of its application pool. Corporations, firms and administrators of professional and graduate schools are no longer impressed by over-zealous resumes and competent interviewing. The question that they are posing to us is: can we put our marks where our mouth is?

Can we blame them for this curiosity? After all, the transcript is a powerful piece of information. Aside from facts like program, number of years in school, etc., some interesting year by year trends can be deduced. For instance, time spent at The Cocamo in first year tends to run inversely to your inaugural Queen's marks, while third and fourth year marks are usually higher. Relative performance to the class is also noted.

Perhaps the most insightful information contained within a transcript is the diversity of course selection. A well-rounded course load reflects a well-rounded intellectual development which, arguably, is more powerful and more valuable than any single area of expertise. Sadly, the gatekeepers to our goals, those who "see" the majority of the transcripts first are, often enough, computers. Not until applicant pools become less saturated or artificial intelligence progresses will a student's diversity contribute to their marketability. This portrayal of a successful undergraduate career through statistical triumph, rather than the breadth of one's knowledge base, threatens our flexibility in course selection and with that, the foundation of the undergraduate degree.

The pressure to perform is crowding out the undergraduate's flexibility in course selection. Elective choices are influenced by the probability of doing well.

Whether your goal is grad school, Bay Street or somewhere in between, the marks you achieve at the undergraduate level will, more or less, write you're ticket, whatever you're headed. If Puff Daddy were an academic, he'd certainly be the first to concede that "it's all about the marks". Truth is, for many students the undergraduate degree has become a mere stepping stone to bigger things. Most disturbing about this attitude is that a student's undergraduate years are the most flexible of their educational career, affording a learning environment that cannot be found at any other level.

Given the current pressure/need to perform at this level, can we seriously take advantage of this flexibility? Answer this for yourself, look through a course calendar and take note of all the courses, outside of your discipline, that interest you. If you're like most, courses that are completely foreign make the most interesting electives. Yet, few engineers take music electives and few art history majors take on organic chemistry. Why is this? The very ignorance that inspires us to learn new subjects also has an increasingly inhibitory effect when we consider how an uncharted learning curve may affect our grade and, thus, our future. We are the poster children for the plight of the undergraduate education.

And while a few courageous students can be found chanting, in pure Braveheart style, that "they may take our marks, but they can never take our academic freedom," the rest of us cannot refute the power of statistical success of in the classroom.

There are societal implications of the narrowed undergraduate degrees that are being churned out these days. Do we want lawyers with no knowledge of psychology defending a misguided teen in youth court? Doctors who need to remind themselves "i before e, except after c" when writing prescriptions or genetic researchers, capable of cloning anything on the planet, who don't know the works of Mary Shelley? Our greatest minds have consistently been those whose genius has been typified by diversity: Einstein, Plato, Aristotle, Galileo or Newton, to name a few.

Pending curriculum changes indicate that administrators are aware of the diversity prevailing over our undergraduate degrees. While proposed multi-disciplinary components to all degrees would offer breadth to our programs, our marks may suffer. It is my belief that alternative marking schemes for electives should be taken into consideration.

Trashy transcripts

Dear Editors,

Queen's University prides itself on being student centered and research oriented or, more correctly, Queen's prides itself on the reputation of being student centered and research oriented. Queen's likes to think that Queen's graduates are highly prized.

Last week, I was applying for a job. They wanted copies of my transcripts. After digging through my files, I found my transcript from my last university — laser printed, easy to read, personally signed — something you'd be proud to give a potential employer. Last year, I paid three dollars for this transcript. At the time, three dollars too much. Then I got my transcript from Queen's. My three dollars suddenly seemed like a bargain.

Letters to the Editors

justify charging five dollars for this piece of complete crap. I am embarrassed to give this to a potential employer. Highly embarrassed.

To the people in the Queen's administration I say this: pull your socks up. How can you justify charging money for a piece of crap? You say that you are student centered, but there's no way that one of your transcripts could help a student in any way (apart from making a bad impression). I am not proud to have gone to this university.

Since arriving here, I have been consistently disappointed by Queen's. The counter at Richardson Hall is cold and uninviting. This does nothing for my confidence in the university.

Freedom of speech?

Dear Editors,

How can they justify charging five dollars for this piece of complete crap. I am highly embarrassed to give this to a potential employer.

The printer they used to print that thing was almost out of ink. I could barely read it. Understanding it was another problem. Printed in landscape using lots of codes which were not listed on the back. The signature wasn't real. It was photocopied. The entire transcript was computer generated, not human involvement. So how can they done, if they wanted to express an opinion different from my own, is take the time to put up their own posters up, instead of tearing down mine.

The posters I put up were in no way offensive and merely expressed a professed opinion, an opinion that I think I should be allowed to express. For those students who did not get a chance to read my posters as a result of the students who are against freedom of speech, I would like to include here the message I tried to get across through my posters.

The posters I put up were in no way offensive and merely expressed a pro-fetus opinion, an opinion that I think I should be allowed to profess.

One of the posters I put up merely stated, "Let's stop prejudice based on stage of development," and then defined post-natal supremacy to be an attitude of superiority or hatred toward those who have not yet reached the stage of development known as birth. It seems to me that if a similar poster were put up condemning prejudice based on race, religion, skin colour, sexual orientation, or anything else, the poster would still be standing.

Another poster I put up said, "If the fetus could talk - I might be younger and smaller than you, but I'm just as human!" Thus, I was merely trying to get people to look at things from the fetus' point of view and to see that the differences between a fetus and a newborn are only really superficial and no better a criteria for being human than is race, religion, skin colour, sexual orientation or anything else.

Other posters I put up include facts about the unborn children that many people may not have known. Thus, these posters are merely for educational purposes and are not really subjective in nature. Some of these facts which I would like people to be aware of, but which I'm apparently not allowed to state on Queen's campus, are the following:

1) During an abortion, the fetus screams in agony failing to be heard only because its lungs are not yet fully developed. If the abortion occurs after the fetus is one month old (before most

Prison life

FOR MARRIED CONVICTS, it has replaced the TV room. For many single prisoners, it is the place where they meet and court their lovers and sweethearts.

It is also where mothers and fathers talk to sons, and where children play. It is the prison visiting room at Kingston Penitentiary.

Every Friday, I see the women, old and young, come in festive clothes patiently waiting to be let in the prison. In the chilly afternoon air, mothers, lovers, wives, and children wait their turn to be searched and questioned. But that's alright because love is always patient.

The patience is sorely tested while these women sit and wait for authorities to strip search their lover. Inside, the prisoners are even more anxious and thoughts like, "What's taking so long?" and "Where is she?" are common. There is no way for them to know - there are too many bars to overcome between their world and this free universe we inhabit.

Then finally, "wham!" Suddenly, everything is reduced to one person. Two pairs of eyes connect and the worries of world fade away. For a while, they can pretend to be alone and that everything is as it should be once again, like it was before the clock stopped ticking. For a while.

The children, dressed in their Sunday best, slowly relax as they see the almost forgotten man known only to them as Dad or Daddy. These children usually go off and play with the toys and watch movies that are arranged in another part of the room.

Behind the raised glass tower, the supervisors sit. They watch carefully with hidden cameras as the couples talk. Several of the couples in the visiting room are kissing tenderly, as if they were teenagers on a date. However, the couples are adults and some have been married for years. Privacy is impossible in the visitation room and often the couples huddle together, shielding themselves from the observers' side of the room as they embrace.

The supervisors are human. Sometimes they try not to watch too closely, but they can't ignore what is going on in the visitation room. It is their job to watch. Occasionally a supervisor embarrasses a couple by telling them to stop on the loud-speaker. The couple, oblivious to the outside world, listen obediently. If they refuse, the punishment may include a stay in "the hole" for the convict or the couple may be forced to have "secure visits" during which they are separated by a glass shield.

Tears of loneliness erase my misconception that prisons do not punish.

The afternoon ends not with a bang, but with a whimper. Within every visit is a feeling of unrestrained joy and gratitude, but there is also the emptiness that comes with every time a visit ends. Some people think that prisons do not punish. They have never seen the aftermath of a visitation room. And the last conversations! "When this is all over... Remember when... Of course I've been faithful..." Tears of loneliness erase my earlier misconceptions that prisons don't punish.

The historical system of "penitentiaries" inherited from 19th century England is unjust. We focus too much on punishment. Ideas from the medieval times like putting a prisoner "into the hole" are obsolete. Prison life that suppresses the basic needs of human beings will actually increase the incidence of crime. In order to reduce recidivism, a sense of commonality is needed. The prisoner must have a stake in a future that they will feel responsible for. The public must give the same impartiality to the prisoner that they give to the rest of the population. Right now, our penitentiaries serve as little more than holding tanks and do not protect Canada from harm - they breed harm. This primitive treatment can only be detrimental to prisoners, increasing rates of recidivism, and, thus, harming society itself.

Mark Salvador, Arts '00, is a volunteer with the John Howard Society and visits Kingston Penitentiary every Friday.

women know they're pregnant), the fetus has a heart beat which will jump to twice as fast as the machine used even approaches the fetus' territory.

2) The mother's body recognizes that the fetus is not a part of herself and eight days after conception actually fights against the pregnancy (which results in a miscarriage about one in every ten cases). But nine out of ten times, through an ingenious defence, the child succeeds in repelling the attack.

3) At the 3-cell stage, the baby's DNA is so complicated that the chances of a cell of one person being the same as that of another is less than one in a million millions, even at the one-cell stage, its single single cell is distinctly human. The fact that no genetic information is passed along to the fetus after the conception should be obvious once one realizes that half of each child's genetics comes from its biological father, who could not possibly have passed along the genetic information any later during the pregnancy than during conception.

4) Once a sperm has entered an ovum, it is possible for it to be transferred to a woman who is not the biological mother and still develop into an adult human being. Thus, the fetus is a human being, independent of its biological mother, from conception. In fact, it will develop the same, genetically, as it would have in its biological mother.

Dear Editors,

If this is what our QEA opt-outable fee is going to, we want it back. On Tuesday night, we frantically searched Etherington Hall so that we could get a seat for the 7:00 speaker on "Who Killed Kurt Cobain?". After finally finding the building, we waited until 7:10, happily eating wonderful cheesecake from the Laundry Café offered by the AMS Coffee House committee and then proceeded into the auditorium.

Introduced as a "close, personal friend" of Kurt Cobain, Ian Halperin proceeded to give his audience of about 50, an oral copy of his resume. Credentials are always useful and Ian, as a former "radical editor" of a Concordia University newspaper, made us aware of this for 10 minutes. It was a little much and, frankly, we didn't care. After this egomania, he proceeded to verbosely insult Conrad Black and The National Post. And as if that weren't declass enough, he slagged the Whig-Standard saying that he read it and implying that it was a piece of shit.

Numerous "hands-up" audience surveys to answer questions like, "Any Courtney Love fans here?" or "Who has heard of me?" paved the way for Mr. Halperin to begin his story of "Who Killed Kurt Cobain?". Showing what seemed to be fake pictures, videos and audio tapes of people allegedly involved in the case. This supposed "investigative journalist" used words like "intimidate" and used "reprimanded" completely out of context.

In our opinion, this guy was full of shit and had no idea what he was talking about. In fact, we even speculated that this was a cruel joke played on the community by the QEA and Campus Activities Commission and that someone would pop up at the end and say, "Haha, you believed him!" For an editor, Mr. Halperin said "umm..." a lot and used unnecessary profanity.

We opt into QEA fees to see performers like the Rascalz, not babbling, egotistical fools with crazy conspiracy theories about a dead musician.

So we ask, how did the QEA think that this man would be well-received at Queen's? Just because he wrote about Kurt Cobain? Or perhaps because his most recent work in progress is an expose of what goes on behind the scenes in Celine Dion's life? It's a mystery to us as to how anyone could take this guy seriously.

We opt into QEA fees to see performers like the Rascalz and the Philosopher Kings and to hear speakers like Pierre Trudeau and Joe MacDonald, not babbling egotistical fools with, in our opinion, crazy conspiracy theories about a dead musician.

But we must not put all of the blame on the QEA. The Campus Activities Commission is also at fault. It was a joint effort.

So here is our advice to the QEA, Campus Activities and anyone else contemplating hiring a guest to Queen's to address to community, one word - INTERVIEW.

Gaels schedules, please

Dear Editors,

I am writing in regards to the Sports and Fitness section in The Journal. Now please don't misinterpret this, I thoroughly enjoy The Journal and I think it's a fine publication, however, I have a simple question. Why is there nothing in the Sports and Fitness section that tells me what Interuniversity teams are playing and when? Maybe I just keep missing it or maybe I'm out of the loop because I'm a first year student, but to me it just seems logical that in the Queen's University publication it would make sense to mention the sports at Queen's and when they're played. Or maybe even just mention their standings along with some statistics to inform people of how well their school teams are performing. Well that's it, that's my beef. Please put something in the Sports and Fitness section so I know what games there are that I can go and watch, and how the teams are doing on a national level because I realize I don't show cause I don't know.

Universities are for learning

Dear Editors,

I respond with delightful glee to Greg Jack's letter in the last issue of The Jour- nal. I think that it's a great idea to raise entry levels to 80%. Well, perhaps the idea completely sucks, let's see.

To summarize his argument: it is pointless to force the closure of universities because all the students will go to other universities; we will not save any money. If we raise the entry level for universities then we will have two effects. Firstly, fewer people will come to university; we will save money. Secondly, only people who will finish university will come, thus we will not waste any money giving people half a degree.

I also notice that in the same issue of The Journal, attendance at universities is dropping. This is perceived as a bad thing because society benefits from a highly educated population.

It is a commonly accepted fact that some high schools are better than others; their students get better grades. It is also known that the high schools which are not so good tend to be in remote areas of the country or give educations to students from low income families, it's a lot easier to study when you know that you'll have food when you get home.

By raising the entry level to 80%, Greg believes that we will have more effective universities. Well, they will be more effective in the sense that they will graduate a higher percentage of students and they will cost less. To maximize effectiveness by this definition we should simply close all universities.

University effectiveness is not about graduating students or minimizing costs. Universities exist to provide a higher, universal education.

University effectiveness is not about graduating students or minimizing costs. Universities exist to provide a higher education, a universal education. University graduates should be able to look at aspects of life and society objectively and subjectively, ideally and realistically. They should then work out the differences between these views and communicate these thoughts to others.

Different subjects at university provide different views of life. What remains constant is the not the ability to get a job, but the ability to communicate thoughts and ideas. Remember that even though science and economics came out of universities, the purpose of university is not to teach people to be scientists or to get people jobs, but to help people communicate thoughts, ideas and feelings coherently.

Also Greg, now that you have your university degree aren't you being just a little selfish? You are trying to reduce the number of people with your qualification so that it's worth more. Break out of your monetary centered idealistic idea of life and look at society, democracy, and more importantly what the monetary centered idealistic view of life is doing to these vital elements/concepts of our life.

Identity lost, identity found

I write in response to the letter by Cindy Cheng entitled "You're white, right? Wrong!" to say that I admire her courage in speak on this "self segregation" that occurs within racial/cultural... whatever collectives society has categorized us. I believe that there is definitely self-segregation occurring, basically because I have grown up in the same situation.

My identity has been long in development. Sure, I too am of Chinese heritage, but born in the United States and raised in western Canada. I've grown up more in the company of Caucasian (white... whatever) friends, in a Canadian society, with many Canadian friends. I've been shaped by a Canadian (and American) influences in the media, culture, and community. My personal thinking was that I was just like any other person on the street, in a crowd, and really... anywhere.

It would be tragic to have trivial things such as what classes people took or which people we associated with, divide our society.

As I grew up, my consciousness to the world I lived in became aware that I was in fact different. Though I lived one way, I was seen in another. Being Chinese but yet not Chinese... being 'white' but not. This revelation soon bothered me to the point I felt I had an identity crisis. I almost thought of myself as "a white person born in a Chinese body."

When I entered Queen's, I still felt the same way. I made new friends, became active in new activities, and pursued an Arts degree. But on many occasions I was seen as different to the people of same heritage. Even now, I am still eyed in public by some Chinese with suspicion. Interaction with them was friendly, but only to a very limited degree. It always seemed so difficult to associate with them, not only because of how they may perceive me, but how uncomfortable I felt trying to think of myself as one of them.

But I soon overcame my "identity crisis." I no longer considered myself one or the other. I was who I was, regardless of what others thought of me or reacted to my way of life, whether by 'fellow' Chinese or 'fellow' Canadians.

I also decided to do something about the segregation, the attitudes, this vice of society. This year with the help of many friends and interested people, I... we made The United, a new newspaper on campus. Contrary to what some people think, I envisioned it not only to deal with international issues, but with the country, the Queen's community, and basically society - people. As the name suggests, The United was created to get people together and share their views on society, on the community, and on the world as a whole, from no matter what they were or who they are. We are still people of this world, regardless of race, ethnicity, gender, religion, culture, and the rest of those categories society has divided us.

It would be tragic to have such trivial things such as what classes people took or which people we associated with, divide our society.

I may be shunned by those descended from the same heritage. I may be differently viewed from the outside and within. I am Chinese, but I am also a world citizen, a Canadian, a political studies student, and much more. Just because I am Chinese does not mean I have expectations or obligations to be a part of that heritage. I have my own identity, my own life, and my own beliefs that may seem contrary to those of my Chinese peers, but they cannot dictate who I am. I am who I am, and no one should judge that on the basis of heritage, race, or anything else.

It's Franklin's Fault

Dear Editors,

On Thursday November 26th I went to the Trasteria to check out Franklin's Fault. I heard a number of impressions about them and wanted to check them out for myself, and all I have to say is that the suck big time. Ska-jazz my ass, I can't remember the last time I heard a band that sounded so bad. As a writer this letter I'm listening to the New York Ska-Jazz Ensemble, now this is real ska-jazz. Whatever Franklin's Fault played wasn't ska-jazz or even ska. The Mavericks, for God's sake, are more ska than Franklin's Fault.

As someone who has been in the ska scene for a number of years, who has been to plenty of shows, and who also plays in a REAL ska band I think that my opinions are justified. First of all the horns were way too quiet, in a ska band the horns are first followed by the vocals, bass, and guitar. Overall the vocals were horrible and were the worst part of the band, and considering how bad the band was this was a major achievement.

Another thing that got me was the sloppy guitar playing, a ska band should have a clear guitar line.

If you want to hear some real good ska check out the Kingpins, Planet Smashers, Slackers, Hepcat, Skatallites, and the Toasters. In terms of labels, anything on STOMP or MOONSKA is a good bet. There are literally hundreds of great ska bands throughout Canada, the US, Europe, Japan, Australia, and South America. The bands I mentioned are easy to find even in Kingston. I have friends who have slogged away for years to raise the profile of ska and they don't need a bunch of university students pretending to be something they aren't.

I will never doubt my friends again about whether a bands sucks or not. I just have one thing to say to Franklin's Fault, either do it right or don't do it at all.

Historical herbivores

Would it be better to use this land to grow soy or canola than to graze cattle? Some scientists think so.

BY ANGELA JAMES

EATING MEAT IS A COMMON NORTH American practice so it comes as no surprise that vegetarianism is often met with considerable skepticism. Vegetarians are often stereotyped as pale-faced hippies or recent trendy converts. However, far from being a recently developed fad, vegetarianism is a practice with an extensive history. One interesting aspect of the history of vegetarianism is that many of the philosophies are that support it are able to withstand modern scrutiny — in fact several are endorsed by current scientific research.

The reasons for selecting a vegetarian lifestyle are varied. One reason that is often given to support a vegetarian lifestyle is a moral stance against causing harm to animals. This is a component of certain Eastern religions, including Hinduism and Jainism. In India, during the third century B.C., Emperor Asoka even instituted vegetarianism as a national practice.

Scientists estimate that the land used to feed one meat eater could feed 20 vegans.

In his development of this philosophy of vegetarianism as respect for animals in 233 A.D., the Greek philosopher Porphyry insisted there was no moral distinction between humans and animals. He adopted a vegetarian lifestyle and believed that it is the meat eaters who need to justify their moral stance and not on those who abstain from eating animal flesh. According to Porphyry, animals possess sensation, perception and memory. Since he considered reason to be a matter of degree, rather than an entity humans possess and animals do not, Porphyry believed that natural bonds existed among living creatures encompassing a moral community that includes animals.

Porphyry's treatment of this issue is congruent with modern ideas. Neuroscience research uses a variety of animals to demonstrate the development of certain cognitive properties, including learning and memory. These research animal models have found that these fundamental bases of cognitive structure clearly exist in animals.

Another philosophy of vegetarianism is centered on health benefits derived from limiting meat consumption. This philosophy contends that diets that avoid meat are better suited to humans. Investigation of primates closely related to humans reveals that these species tend to have low meat contents in their diets. Further suggestions that the natural diet of humans is primarily vegetarian comes from examination of diet structure in indigenous cultures, where recent technologies would not have corrupted the basic aspects of food availability and choice. These people also tend to have lower incidences of cardiovascular illnesses and gastrointestinal cancers.

Plato espoused vegetarianism for health reasons. Famous health-based vegetarians also include Leonardo da Vinci and Adolph Hitler. The so-called "muscular Christians" of the mid-1800s practiced strict fundamentalist lifestyles that included the avoidance of meat. These individuals credited their perceived increases in strength and endurance as being due to vegetarianism. An evaluation of these claims in light of modern evidence regarding nutrition and health indicate a degree of truth.

Recent studies suggest that vegetarian lifestyles can be healthy and nutritionally adequate. Positive relationships exist between a vegetarian diet and reduced risk for several chronic degenerative diseases and conditions, including obesity, hypertension, diabetes, coronary artery disease and several types of cancer. One major reason often provided to explain why vegetarianism offers protection against various ailments is that vegetarian diets tend to be lower in saturated fat intake. Another protective factor in vegetarian diets is increased fiber content. This elevated fiber content serves to limit exposure to potentially carcinogenic substances by increasing gastrointestinal motility.

Though vegetarian diets are often believed to omit several important nutrients, nutritional needs can be met with careful planning. Calcium is plentiful in many plant products and the body absorbs the nutrient very well from these sources. As well, adequate protein levels can be achieved. Certain amino acids, the essential amino acids, must be obtained from dietary sources since no metabolic pathways exist to produce them from other amino acids. Though the essential amino acids are plentiful in many animal products, vegetarians need to be aware of "complementary proteins" or food sources that can be combined to provide all essential amino acids. With well planned diets, however, these nutritional needs can be easily met. Another aspect of vegetarian diets involving greater planning is vitamin B<sub>12</sub> intake. In addition to being present in meat, this substance is present in eggs and dairy products. For vegans, who avoid all animal products as well as meat, this substance can be taken in supplement form. Vitamin B<sub>12</sub> is stored and recycled within the body so only small amounts are generally needed. For this reason, deficiencies may take years to develop.

The nutritional needs of vegetarians can be met with careful planning.

Another argument traditionally used to justify vegetarianism is the environmental prudence of avoiding meat. In addition to health benefits, both Plato and Porphyry believed that vegetarianism offered a more efficient use of land. This argument is particularly compelling today, and the data supporting it can be found in R.T. Miller's Living in the Environment. Scientists estimate that the land used to feed one meat eater could feed 20 vegans. Direct energy transfer from plants to humans is more efficient than the process of deriving energy from animals nourished by vegetation. About two-thirds of U.S. cropland is used to feed cattle whereas only 2 per cent is used to grow vegetables to feed humans. Livestock currently consumes 38 per cent of the world's grain. In addition to being highly inefficient, livestock agriculture is often damaging to the environment. About 85 per cent of U.S. topsoil loss is directly associated with livestock grazing. A major cause of desertification in arid and semi-arid areas is the trampling of the soil by livestock.

Clearly, philosophies justifying this lifestyle choice are based upon arguments that are considered valid by modern standards. The fact that these arguments remain valid despite centuries of scientific advances is a strong testament to their credence.

DS1's engines back online

The ion drive of Deep Space 1, NASA's experimental spacecraft, has been running smoothly since it was successfully started last Tuesday. Earlier this month, when the experimental propulsion system was originally powered up, the engine shut itself off after only 4½ minutes. NASA engineers now suspect that metallic contaminants between the engine's two high-voltage grids caused the initial failure, but were vaporized by subsequent attempts. NASA is unapologetic about Deep Space 1's less-than-perfect performance. "If everything worked perfectly on the first try, it would be an indication we had not been sufficiently aggressive in selecting the technologies," said chief mission engineer Marc Rayman.

Smoking won't keep you thin

According to a study to be published in December's Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, smoking does not allow young adults to lose weight or to control weight gain. The report follows an analysis of a data set of 4,000 people, ages 18 to 30, by researchers at the University of Memphis. Among those individuals who smoked or started smoking during the study, no significant weight loss or attenuation of weight gain was recorded. The study did show, however, that those who quit smoking during the study showed greater weight gain than those who continued to smoke or never smoked at all.

Consumer group says PVC toy ban just hype

Consumer Alert, an industry-backed consumer group, says that the recent Toys 'R' Us ban on PVC baby toys is not based in fact. It says that Greenpeace, who has waged a long campaign against PVC toys, has no scientific basis for its contention that the levels of phthalates in these toys pose a danger to children. Phthalates are a group of chemicals used in plastics, inks, and vinyl flooring. High doses of phthalates have been linked to liver and kidney damage in lab animals.

Life on planet Kingston

Confessions of a townie inmate

By JOCELYN LAPORTE

IT IS DIFFICULT to convince your parents of any necessity for leaving home when one of the best universities in the country is only a few short minutes away. Thinking back, I remember the reluctance I felt beginning my studies here at Queen's. I was not moving into residence like the rest of my classmates. I was not even leaving home. At the time it all seemed grossly unfair.

Frosh week did nothing to greatly increase my enthusiasm about attending university in my hometown. I had no desire to perform hideous stunts on the streets of downtown Kingston where someone who knew me or my family was sure to pass by. As well, the 15 minute drive home every night put a significant damper on my daily alcohol consumption.

Things slowly began to show their brighter side once I realised some of the benefits of remaining at home. I was able to avoid the usual pressures of meeting an entire new group of friends, as many of the people from my high school were also attending Queen's. In addition, my desire to live in residence quickly dissolved the day I went to Victoria Hall to study with a friend I had met in economics class. Perhaps it is a direct result of being an only child, but residence life, from my perspective, brings a whole new meaning to the word "share." Suddenly my large room, home cooked meals and personal laundry steward I affectionately called "mom" were starting to look pretty good. I had friends, a boyfriend, a job and, best of all, I did not have to share a tiny brick cell with a stranger and her late night guests. Some people are astonished to learn I still live with my parents. It is not typical for "townie" students to stay at home. In fact, most of my Kingston friends moved out in their second or third year. While I may have missed out on learning to maintain a household with others, I can say that my parents and I have significantly developed our relationship and respect for one another during my university years. This is something I deem equally valuable.

THERE HAVE BEEN many ups and downs to my perpetual inhabitation of Kingston. Looking back, I can definitely recognise many things I have missed out on, however, I can also see much I have gained.

The largest bonus of my long term stay at "Hotel Mom and Dad" is, of course, financial. Had I gone to an out-of-town university, I would, without a doubt, have accumulated a substantial debt under my name by this point in my academic career. Choosing to stay at home not only helped me avoid this all too common result of university life, but it has also enabled me to maintain a reasonably satisfactory standard of living.

Still, I have missed out. One of the things I regret most is my lack of early involvement in Queen's-centered activities. Even now, in my final year, I continue to view Queen's as only a small portion of my hometown. In comparison, however, a lot of Queen's students remain restricted to campus, rarely taking the time to experience what our city offers outside of the downtown core.

I spoke with a fellow townie and Queen's student, Jesse (a.k.a. "Pepper") about this issue and he too lamented over the large gap which exists between Queen's and the City of Kingston.

"Kingston has a lot of culture for a city of its size and it's too bad students do not take more advantage of that," he said. He also expressed concern about the Kingstontians who have animosity toward Queen's students, adding that Kingston owes a lot of its culture to Queen's.

A few days after my conversation with Jesse, I spoke with a friend whom I had not seen for a few years. She had gone out of province to university and had spent a year studying in Europe. I was surprised to hear her comments about a mutual friend of ours. She was impressed at how someone who had not left Kingston could become so cultured. This opinion, that someone who has remained in one city is somehow less exposed, is a common and disturbing one. I see no reason why remaining in one city should necessarily limit your cultural exposure. While your first-hand knowledge is, no doubt, affected by remaining in one area, there are still many ways you can become exposed to the world. Our city is filled with great culture, but you have to seek it out. Through reading and education we have the ability to expose ourselves to vast amounts of knowledge and, if the historic sites, libraries, theatres, restaurants, galleries and other cultural establishments of Kingston do not suffice, one can always venture the short trip to Toronto, Ottawa or Montréal.

Nevertheless, some of my friends regret staying in Kingston. While discussing this issue with my friend Robin she admitted that, had she to do it again, she would choose to move away from home. There are certain lessons one can learn when away, she argued, that are unattainable living in the same city as your family. For example, being completely responsible for yourself, without anyone to fall back on, presents an unquestionable opportunity for growth. She also pointed out that, while the means of attaining cultural growth and experience exist in smaller cities, their accessibility is much more limited and, therefore, tend to reach fewer people. She maintained that it would

Masters student and moonlighting musician Jon Coakley — up close and personal

listen mother sister brother relatives and kin you want to know just where you're going you got to know where you've been — Ben Harper

KINGSTON MUSICIAN JON COAKLEY may have the quiet confidence of a man who knows where he's going, but he hasn't forgotten where he's been. Raised in Hamilton, Ontario, with roots stretching from Norway to the Bahamas, Coakley performs with a humble grace that reflects his own shy but compelling personality. With simple but powerful lyrics, he conveys a respect for nature and a political idealism in songs that are often based on personal experiences.

These days, however, life as a graduate student in chemical engineering at Queen's has limited the scope of experiences for one of Kingston's most promising musicians. Between finishing his thesis, bartending at the grad club and managing his own band, he worries that he might be losing himself somewhere in-between.

"I sometimes feel like I have multiple personalities... I've been stretching myself pretty thin and sometimes you just lose sight of who you are and just become what you're doing."

Writing and performing music wasn't always a major part of John Coakley's life at Queen's. "I hung out on campus," he says, "I was at Alfie's and all those places all the time and I never really got a chance to do other things outside of campus." Although he played in a band during high school, Coakley spent most of his four years as a civil engineering undergraduate living like a typical Queen's student.

After a three year hiatus from music, Coakley picked up his guitar again when he started busking in downtown Kingston last year. "I was broke just before Christmas and I needed some cash. I was busking on Princess Street... you can make mad cash doing that."

One day, while busking outside the Grizzly Grill, he attracted the attention of a fellow Kingston musician and the two went on to form the band Bug Daddy and the Shack. A year later, the band's name has changed and many other musicians have come and gone. "I think I've played with around eight or nine different musicians... the band has changed so much, now it's John Coakley and One Metric Tonne."

"I find the students are amazingly supportive... There's a really good crowd of music lovers at this school."

COAKLEY'S MUSIC wasn't always as introspective as it is now. "Before a year and a half ago all the stuff I wrote was pretty impersonal, but lately I'm trying to write a lot more personal stuff." Besides drawing on events in his own life, Coakley's lyrics are heavily influenced by what he perceives as political and economic inequities in the world. "I'm not into writing about money and BMWs. I want to write about stuff that's important to me, and people and politics are much more important to me than rolling with the homies, though that does have a place. I'm not trying to devalue rap music, I listen to it all the time. I just find a lot of the popular hip hop is not very stimulating."

Although he does listen primarily to reggae and jazz, Coakley has an affinity for most musical genres and often plays covers of Bob Marley and Ben Harper songs.

Coakley's music is also influenced by the support of a large family. "I've got a huge family, not many of them in Canada but they're very supportive and I maintain a strong connection with them." He credits his diverse roots for helping to shape his character. "Coming from Hamilton gives me humility, having family in the Bahamas gives me some sort of connection with that side of my personality, and my mother's Norwegian. Over in Norway it's dark six months a year so you better know how to talk to someone."

While Coakley is indeed very articulate, he sometimes feels inhibited on stage by his soft-spoken manner.

The presence of his friends and girlfriend Deb Hume at his shows makes the experience more comfortable for him. "Deb has yet to miss a show. She's always there. I feel like if a show isn't going well, I know she's somewhere in the crowd. She's a bit of a normalizing factor I guess... my friends are usually the first people to dance. They're just there to talk to me between sets and stop me from feeling like a wallflower, which is how I usually feel in a situation like that."

The intensely personal nature of Coakley's work is in part responsible for his shyness on stage. "Getting up and talking about personal stuff like that in front of people, I almost feel like you're exposing your soul and it's tough. If your show isn't just right, it's rough afterwards. You really feel dragged through the dirt, not by the crowd, the crowd's always great. It's just a personal thing."

Coakley looks upon the support he has received from the Queen's community with fondness and appreciation. "I feel really comfortable playing at Queen's," he says, "I know a lot of people and I find the students are amazingly supportive... There's a really good crowd of music lovers at this school. It's been great at helping my confidence up there when the crowd's receptive... My favorite show was at Science Formal this year when the crowd was banging against my microphone and people were collapsing on the monitors 'cause they were so drunk, but it was great 'cause the crowd was right there and you could smell the sweat of those people and that was perfect."

Coakley thinks his music appeals to some because it's grounded in authenticity.

"There are a lot of people who like hearing real only be those who actively sought out such cultural exposure, such as university students, who would be successful in attaining it.

I accept the opinions of others who have been raised in Kingston as valid facets of their experience. However, it is infuriating to hear non-Kingstonians perpetually insult the city I call home. While the stereotype of a "townie" may apply to some specific individuals living in Kingston, it does not apply to all, or even a majority of its residents. I admit that Kingston is a small town. While it may not be a corporate centre to launch a career from, or even offer a particularly large array of shopping and entertainment options, it is still a beautiful city enriched with a historic past.

THAT SAID, I'll admit it. It's true, I am a townie. However, I think it is important to recognize the stigmatism this stereotype perpetuates. Unfairly lumping individuals together based on their geographic location and applying a norm to them as a group is prejudice and nothing less. While I joke about being a townie, I am offended when knowledge of my "locality" obscures people's conception of who I am — which is a lot more than the sum of a town's vices.

I have no ambition to remain in Kingston after graduating from Queen's, yet it was still a wonderful place to grow up and is an equally wonderful place to call home. Staying in Kingston throughout my education has taught me a valuable and life long lesson: no matter what hand you're dealt in life's game of poker, it is up to you to make a winning hand. Instead of focusing on your losses look to your gains and you may find value in something you had not even anticipated.

stuff. Even with the instruments in the hand I try to keep it simple — acoustic instruments, because it just seems more natural. The sound of a stick on wood is a lot more pleasing to me than a drum machine. I think my audience is just looking for something that's natural and not processed."

As much as he enjoys performing at Queen's, Coakley is also focusing his attention off campus. The intimacy of the local music scene has allowed Coakley to receive a great deal of feedback from Kingston bands. "I feel like I've either met, talked to, or played with most of the musicians in Kingston, aside from the Hip or Weeping Tile... They all come out to shows. They all give you constructive criticism or positive feedback, depending on how the night went."

Coakley describes the Kingston music scene as perhaps "too nurturing," especially in comparison with the cut-throat competition between musicians in larger cities like Toronto, Montreal and New York City. However, Coakley feels musicians have to go a big city to succeed in the music business. "I don't think you can make it in Kingston."

While he isn't sure where he will live after he finishes his Masters thesis this year, Coakley hopes a career in music lies ahead. "I've got this ideal image of how I want it all to go and I'd love to make a career out of it. I think it's pretty hard to make it as a musician. This is what I want to do right now but if I find that I can't do it I'm not going to go into depression."

COAKLEY HOPES that in the near future a grant from the government will allow him to record and produce a full length CD. Up until now, he has been unable to record a CD because of his time commitments at Queen's and the financial burden of being a graduate student. "Right now my main goal is to pay off my student loans."

While not a star yet, Coakley's gifts and unassuming personality have already left an impression on the Queen's community. "I've never doubted myself more than I have in the past year or so, but I've never felt so hopeful about the future at the same time."

Two great finishes Queen's hockey salvage ties with last minute goals.

BY NAEETE SAGER

Despite being hampered by injuries and chronic ill luck around the opposing goal, the Queen's men's hockey team managed a pair of ties last weekend to maintain its hold on first place in the OUA Mideast division. On Friday, November 20 against York, the Gaels earned a 4-4 tie by virtue of a Rob Mailloux goal with 11 seconds remaining in regulation time. The following evening, in an instance of deja vu, Queen's earned a much needed point due to another eleventh-hour equalizer, with forward Matt Thorne performing the late heroics to forge a 2-2 tie with Laurentian.

"The two games this weekend are a reflection of our depth and character," commented Queen's Head Coach Chris MacDonald. "It would be very easy to focus on the injury problems we've been having. There were several reasons why we could have folded in either game."

After spotting the visiting Yeomen a 3-0 lead on Friday, the Gaels fought back to tie, with Derek Johnston assisting on all three markers. Johnston made an exquisite centring pass to Dave Wilson, who put the Gaels on the scoreboard midway through the second period. Before the intermission, Matt Reid cut the York lead to one, putting a goal off his own rebound.

At the six-minute mark of the third period, the Gaels drew even, as winger Phil Lindsay's howitzer caught the underside of the crossbar and deflected into the cage. However, less than a minute later, York regained the lead, as a Gaels' turnover in the neutral zone led to a breakout for forward Scott Oswin, who bested Queen's netminder Jason Skilnick.

In a frantic final minute, the Gaels swarmed the York zone. With the seconds ticking away, Jeff Scobie centred to Jason Flynn, who got a shot away. Yeomen goaltender Bobby DaCosta kicked out the shot, but the rebound came to Mailloux, who calmly tapped the frozen black rubber disc home.

The following evening against Laurentian, Queen's again trailed for much of the contest, vexed by Laurentian netminder Jarrett Rose, who time and time again emerged from a Gaels' flurry. Late in the second period, the Gaels finally broke through, as forward Matt Reid scored for the second straight game to even the contest 1-1. "It was great to see Johnston and Reid have success," remarked MacDonald.

Early in the third period, though, an egregious giveaway resulted in the go-ahead goal for the Voyageurs. The Gaels immediately pushed to pull even, but Rose, who recorded 50 saves on the evening, seemingly did everything but swallow the puck in preserving the narrow lead.

With less than a minute to play, Queen's was again forced to turn to its opportunistic offence, forcing the puck into the visitors' end and maneuvering for a scoring opportunity. With 42 seconds remaining, Mailloux centred the puck to Thorne, the extra attacker, at the lip of the crease. Calmly waiting until Laurentian's Rose committed himself, Thorne dented the twine, forcing overtime. In the extra session, Skilnick performed heroically, making a half-dozen of his 23 saves to stave off defeat.

With divisional rivals Guelph and Toronto stumbling, the Gaels, now 3-4-4, remain in first place in the OUA Mideast.

Tough weekend split for Gaels

BY CALVIN LAM

On the weekend of November 20, the Queen's women's basketball team travelled to Quebec to take on Laval and Bishop's in a pair of inter-conference match-ups between the OUA and the QSSF. On Friday, the Gaels posted a 59-53 come-from-behind win over Laval but were unable to continue their momentum against

Queen's 59, Laval 53
Bishop's 55, Queen's 50

Bishop's, losing 55-50 on Saturday. The win over ninth-ranked Laval and the narrow defeat to 10th-ranked Bishop's left the team with a respectable 3-1 record.

In their first game against the Rouge et Or, the Gaels fell behind early due to poor shooting and passing in the first half. However as the game progressed, Queen's got stronger and stronger. Led by a balanced offensive attack which saw four different players reach double digits in scoring, the women were able to erase the early deficit. Jacqueline Beaudoin set the pace with a team high 15 points, Kingston native and second year player Jen Jackson added 14, while captain Wendy Moon and point guard Deannah Shelley each chipped in with 12. Although the Gaels did come away with the win, Head Coach Dave Wilson expressed concern with his team's sluggish start. Sunday's game against the Gaiters saw Wilson's concerns become reality. The Gaels got off to another miserable start, forcing them to play catch up for the remainder of the game.

"There are a couple of little things that I think we are going to need to change in practice."

— Head Coach Dave Wilson

At half-time, Queen's went into the locker room with only 16 points. Only a solid defensive effort kept Queen's in the game with the score 23-16. The team rallied in the second half with improved all-around play, but it was simply not enough. "Against both teams [Laval and Bishop's] we were not overly sharp but we had an especially dreadful first half against Bishop's," explained Wilson. Although the Gaels were without their leading scorer, Beaudoin, who missed the game for personal reasons, Wilson refused to attribute the loss to her absence. Instead, Wilson blamed the loss on the team's slow start which has been a problem in each of their first four games. "There are a couple of little things that I think we are going to need to change in practice," promised Wilson.

Obesity: more than just appearance

BY JULIETA LOEFFLER

Did you know that 45 per cent of Canada's population has a weight problem?

People with this problem can be classified as either overweight or obese. These two terms are often used interchangeably, but there is a difference between them.

Overweight is a term used when a person's body mass index is higher than 25, and obese is associated with a body mass index of more than 30. The BMI is a relatively easy method of figuring out health risk in relation to body weight and height. It is calculated by taking a person's weight in kilograms and dividing that by their height squared. This method does not take into account the amount of muscle mass in the body. Therefore a very muscular person can have a high BMI but will not have the health risks associated with a high BMI. BMI also depends on age and sex — your doctor probably has a chart which determines your BMI.

Most people know that obesity is unhealthy, but many are not aware of the health risks that are associated with having a BMI of more than 30. Obesity is considered the second highest cause of preventable death. This is due to the numerous health problems it helps create, including hyperlipidemia, coronary heart disease, a high prevalence of type II diabetes, and various psychological and social problems.

Hyperlipidemia is simply fat in the blood. When fat is in the blood, it is transferred to different organs and muscles quickly. In those areas, it can interfere with the function of these muscles and organs. In particular, it interferes with the absorption of glucose.

Coronary heart disease (heart attack) is associated with obesity because of fat in the blood. The gradual narrowing of the arteries is a process that begins with several lipids being present in the bloodstream, including cholesterol, triglycerides, phospholipids, and fatty acids. These fats gradually build up on the walls of the arteries and cause them to narrow. Sufficient narrowing can cause a heart attack if a blood clot reaches the artery and cannot be circulated.

Diabetes is associated with blood sugar levels. Insulin, a hormone secreted by the pancreas, regulates the amount of sugar in the blood. This process often breaks down in obese people. Ninety percent of diabetics have Type II diabetes, or non-insulin dependent diabetes. Without insulin, which is secreted into the blood stream, the body can not adequately control its blood sugar level.

If you are overweight or obese do not simply put yourself down. Take action. Go and see your doctor about the possibilities offered to you. Every body, regardless of weight, should read as much information as they can about exercise, nutrition, and general health. The first step towards making a difference in your life is knowledge. Once you are equipped with it, you can make an informed decision about your health and well being.

In the game

Queen's athletic results from the week of November 20.

Men's water polo

In men's water polo action this past weekend, the Gaels lost all four matches. While they came close to beating Carleton, losing 1-0, Queen's was outscored in their final three games 45-24. McMaster won 18-8, Western won 15-8 and Toronto drove the final nail into the coffin with a 12-8 victory over the hapless Gaels.

Men's basketball

The men's basketball team came out of La Belle Province with a split against Laval and Bishop's. On Friday night, Athlete of the Week John Purdy led the Gaels to a 69-66 victory over Laval. Purdy had a team-high 22 points and 6 rebounds. The next day, however, Queen's was pummeled by the national champion Bishop's Gaitsers 83-47.

Women's hockey

The women's hockey team travelled to Guelph last weekend and suffered two defeats which dropped their record to 2-6-2. On Friday, the Gaels lost 7-2 and on Saturday they lost a tight game 3-1. Scoring against Guelph were Sarah Reid with two goals and feisty Jess Mullen with a single.

Men's volleyball

The men's volleyball team participated in a Guelph tournament last weekend and returned with a bronze medal. The Gaels defeated Guelph in the bronze medal game 3-2 (16-14, 13-15, 15-4, 13-15, 15-12).

Badminton

The Queen's badminton team hosted the 2nd East Sectional of the year and maintained their hold on the final play-off spot. Caroline Gibbins won five of five singles matches and teamed with stat Anne Brodie to win four of five doubles matches. Gibbins is currently holding on to the top position for winning the individual gold medal for singles.

'Q' Club a forum for alumni support

BY ROBERT MACNEIL

Queen's University recently welcomed the "Q" Club to campus, an organization that endeavors to get former Queen's varsity athletes involved in the current athletics program.

This club was recommended by the University Council on Athletics in 1995 and was further endorsed by Toronto Maple Leafs President and General Manager Ken Dryden in his 1997 review of athletics at Queen's.

The main purpose of the "Q" Club is to give former athletes the opportunity to support current Queen's athletes and hopefully promote and enhance the Tricolour tradition of excellence. A key function of this club will be to recruit new athletes to Queen's.

Chair of Athletics and Recreation John McFarlane said that the student-athlete identification and recruitment by former athletes is considered to be an integral part of current athletic programs.

"A great many of today's Queen's athletes have direct family or friendship ties to Queen's, have been encouraged by past alumni to attend Queen's or were significantly influenced by this group to put Queen's high on their list of potential universities," said McFarlane.

A "Q" club newsletter will be published three times a year as an insert to the Alumni Review and will inform varsity alumni on current student athletes, the Queen's athletic program and upcoming activities involving alumni. The first newsletter was mailed a few weeks ago and McFarlane said that "there has been very positive feedback, [and the alumni] think it's great." In addition to the newsletter, "Q" Club organizers hope to establish an annual graduating student-athlete banquet starting in 2000.

In order to raise money for these events, a one-year contract has been signed with David S. Reid Custom Clothing Ltd. When alumni purchase clothing from the Reid catalogue, which was mailed along with the first newsletter, they will be making a donation to Queen's athletics.

McFarlane said he hopes that this venture will "raise the visibility of Queen's athletics," and he is targeting "people who want to give gifts of Golden Gaels clothing."

Queen's alumni and former 1956 basketball MVP Greg Stone said he feels confident that this business venture will be quite prosperous. "I buy various Queen's clothing anyhow, and my kids buy them for me as well. With this new club I certainly wouldn't stop buying Queen's clothing, in fact, I may be [more inclined] to make straight cash donations to the athletics program".

Stone, who did his Master's at Western, belongs to the "W" Club at that school and declared the Queen's venture to be "a hell of an idea."

"The "W" Club at Western has been around for at least 20 years, it is fairly well-organized, and [its members] help out at London high schools and attracting athletes to campus," said Stone.

According to Stone, "W" Club officials were contacted by Queen's and asked questions about the general set-up and purpose of the club. The University of Toronto is setting up a similar club and Stone has heard that "the three clubs may eventually work together."

McFarlane said he feels that "it is very important to recognize the accomplishments of past, present and future athletes." It appears that the "Q" Club is a step in the right direction.

The last of the hockey shrines

A sports writer's first visit to the cathedral on Carlton Street.

If I were asked by some stranger to North American culture to show him the most important religious building in Canada, I would take him to Toronto's Maple Leaf Gardens.

William Kilbourn, Religion in Canada

IN THE 68TH and final season for the Toronto Maple Leafs at the venerable old barn on Carlton Street, it became imperative that this sports writer make his inaugural visit to a Canadian institution before the Leafs move to the new Air Canada Centre. So with four tickets, three friends, free transportation and the distant ticking of the countdown until moving day, I dove headlong into hockey tradition.

Some may question why a tried and true Canadian hockey fan would wait 21 years before making his first entrance into the last of this country's sports meccas. The answer is two-fold. Firstly, I hate the Toronto Maple Leafs. From the over-hyped expectations, false trade rumours and general ineptitude to the "we are the centre of the universe" attitude of their fans, this team makes me ill. I would rather see Gargamel eat the Smurfs than see the Leafs beat anyone. The second reason is that Canada's smallest NHL rink sits in its largest hockey market. It doesn't take an economics degree to figure out the supply and demand implications — the tickets are a little too pricey.

Despite all of my misgivings, it is the responsibility of every Canadian sports fan to make their pilgrimage to the Gardens and this was my opportunity.

With excitement racing through my veins, the two hour jaunt from Kingston to Toronto, including the essential fast food infusion, felt like it passed in record time. As we raced down Yonge Street, my three mates, all of whom had been to this hockey cathedral before, began to share in the pre-game electricity.

With moments until the opening face-off we entered the building through the very inconspicuous front entrance. Inside what looked like just another building felt like another world.

It had the same narrow corridors you would find at your local indoor rink. It smelled like a hockey rink, not an entertainment complex.

As I strode into the stands I couldn't help but notice the old press box, the compactness of the seating and the steep angle with which the red seats became blues and then the blues turned to greys. Before the two teams took to the ice the scoreboard showed a history of this grand old rink and how it came to be. From the ground breaking to the first game in 1931 and all of the great moments since (not many in recent times), which gave a sense of history and tradition.

The play on the ice seemed like any other NHL game at any modern rink, but the atmosphere was something different. It was like Fenway Park or the old Montreal Forum. Places where you felt that the show was about fans, players and performance, not music, dancers and the most high-tech scoreboard.

As the first period became the second I sat riveted to my seat, thinking nostalgically about how it must have been to watch Sly Apps, Dave Keon, "King" Clancy, Darryl Sittler and other greats from this very seat when my daydream was interrupted by a rousing cheer and a red goal light. This was followed quickly by a chorus of boos when the referee headed to the penalty box to call the video goal judge and confirm or deny a Leafs' goal.

It was like Fenway Park or the old Montreal Forum. Places where you felt that the show was about fans, players and performance, not music, dancers and the most high-tech scoreboard.

The goal was called back, but that concerned me less than the fact that no matter how old the rink, modernity has crept in and taken hold. The replay was simply the tip of the iceberg. Signs of the times included $5 beers, scoreboards that told you when to clap and had dance music before face-offs. While these tastes of today were disconcerting, the game still seemed like it belonged more in a place like this, than in a sanitized multi-purpose facility like the soon to be completed Air Canada Centre.

There is no doubt that the Gardens' atmosphere will not be matched in the new rink, but the reasons for the move become clear while sitting in the "little rink that can". There are limited corporate boxes, the scoreboard is adequate at best, there are too many beer-swilling patrons and too few washrooms, and most importantly there are too many fans and too few seats. These are the same conclusions that led to the end of the Boston Garden, Chicago Stadium, Montreal Forum and soon the Great Western Forum, but these are the realities of the time.

In walking around Maple Leaf Gardens you forget about what has gone wrong of late. From the recent sexual assault controversy to the 30 years it has been since Lord Stanley's Cup has resided here, problems fade to the background in this perfect hockey environment.

When the final buzzer sounded I could safely say that this was an unforgettable experience, even if it did involve the loathsome "Maple Laughs".

By the way, the home team defeated the Calgary Flames 3-2 in a brilliantly played game. The result could not have mattered any less, the experience could not have meant any more.

Adam Kaminsky still hates the Leafs, but for one night he cheered them on.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Basketball player more than just a 'Purdy' face

After two tough losses in the opening weekend of the season, the men's basketball team needed a big performance on the road against Laval and big centre John Purdy provided it. With 22 points and eight rebounds, the Nepean native helped the Gaels to their first win of the season and earned himself the Queen's Journal athlete of the week award.

John Purdy

Purdy, who came to Queen's as an unpolished but extremely athletic ball player, has taken his game to a new level over the four years he has spent here. His inability to stay out of foul trouble has long been his achilles heel, but in this all important match-up he managed to keep on the good side of the officials.

"No team goes to Laval and feels safe with a lead, but [Purdy] stayed in the game and played well," said Head Coach Scott Meeson. Despite scoring a bundle of points, Purdy is quick to give praise to some of his teammates.

"I scored a lot on easy lay-ups and foul shots," said the modest centre. "Most were set up by Derek [Richardson]'s drives and good passes, I just had to finish."

While the numbers put up by Purdy are impressive, it was his all around game that impressed the coach.

"He did a good job of neutralizing [Laval star] Olivier Bisette and breaking the press," said Meeson. "When John wants to play, he's a pretty good player."

The importance of getting that first win of the season can not be underestimated after losing two tight games during the opening weekend.

"[The win] seemed to change the whole mind set of the team," said Purdy, a fourth-year engineering student. "We started to question whether we could win at all. It helped us out a lot."

The team, which followed up their big win with a loss against the defending national champion Bishop's Gaiters in Lennoxville, is one of the most talented in some time and Purdy is optimistic.

"We have some really good players on this team," said the long haired rebounding machine. "We just have to play together. Sometimes it seems like we're always playing one-on-one, and we can't win that way."

With their first two home games of the season against Concordia and McGill last weekend, Purdy and the team will have to make a statement to the rest of their division or they could have a large hill to climb in the second-half of the schedule.

If they can play like they did against Laval, it isn't far fetched that they enter the Christmas break with momentum.

Cheerleaders shine

By ROBERT MACNEIL

The competitive cheerleading squad travelled to York University last weekend and delivered their best performance ever at the national championships.

In the 11-team event, the Gaels finished second to the unbeatable powerhouse known as the University of Western Ontario. The national championships have taken place for 14 years and Western has captured the title every single time. This year, the Mustangs finished with 755 points (out of 800), with the Gaels nipping at their heels with 715 points.

Queen's two-and-a-half minute routine consisted of a detailed set of gymnastics, stunting, pyramid building and cheers. The women and men performed while a hip-hop version of the Star Wars theme, Raise the Roof and other hyperactive music pounded in the background. The routine itself took nearly 36 hours to design and almost six weeks of practice to get it just right. The response from crowd was great, as the D.J. played bag-pipe music to make the team feel at home.

Coach Sandy Han has been in charge of the cheerleading squad for five years and oversees a talented team of nine men and 15 women.

"[The team] has unbelievable chemistry, and with acrobatics, there is a need to develop a lot of trust [with other cheerleaders]," said Han. She said that her squad can be best described as a "very tight family unit, [and at the championships] the other teams really admired us for it."

In addition to cheering on the football team and the men's and women's basketball teams when they are playing at home, the squad is also involved in community work. The squad participates in events for the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation, the United Way and Operation Christmas Child.

While some loyal fans made their way to York University to see the routine, Han hopes her squad will have the opportunity to perform it at an upcoming basketball game.

Word on the Street

By SARAH CROSSIE

The King was alive, but not so well last Friday night at Maple Leaf Gardens. Performing in the Elvis '98 Tour of Champions, Elvis Stojko was less than stellar in the figure skating showcase. Fortunately for Stojko his show was saved by an all-star ensemble and a spark of controversy.

At the end of the Olympics, the world finally took notice of the lack of objectivity involved in ice dance judging.

The controversy of the evening surrounded ice dancers who weren't performing - Canadian gold medalists and national sweethearts, Shae-Lynn Bourne and Victor Kraatz. One of the featured performances was the world premiere of the dance team Pasha Grishuk and Sasha Zhulin, who are no strangers to the world of figure skating.

Grishuk is a two-time Olympic gold medalist, while Zhulin is an Olympic silver medalist. Both Russian skaters formerly skated with other partners, but recently split with their respective pairs to create a new dance team.

When Grishuk and Zhulin took the ice, the applause was more sparse than it had been for every other performer, including unknowns like U.S. silver medalist Tonia Kwiatkowski. Sporadic boing also resonated throughout the rink before the music began for the Russian pair.

The reason? At the Nagano Olympics, Bourne and Kraatz were gold medal contenders, but finished a devastating fourth place, with Russian teams finishing first and second and the French team third.

The European skating judges were accused of block judging, which meant that the judges supposedly scored Bourne and Kraatz so that it was impossible for them to medal. Grishuk was vocal throughout the Olympics, complaining about the Canadian pair's inferiority and lack of substance in their Riverdance routine. At the end of the Olympics, the world finally took notice of the lack of objectivity involved in ice dance judging and how it didn't change. Russians would always finish on top.

Grishuk and Zhulin skated to Sade's "Smooth Operator" and Toni Braxton's "Unbreak My Heart", highlighting not only Grishuk's well known sexual ambience, but the pair's tremendous technical ability, innovative positions and holds, and the tightness of their lines.

Grishuk and Zhulin's performances were more than commendable. Although both the short and long performances featured the same seduction theme, the skaters deserved the same applause as the other skaters, if not more, but only received some obligatory appreciation.

When judging becomes standardized, only then will figure skating be appreciated for its talent, artistry and athleticism.

The question then becomes, as it did Friday evening, should a skater, or any other athlete, be recognized for their technical and artistic ability, or should fans be loyal to their country and their country's athletes?

Should Grishuk and Zhulin have been applauded for their merits or, as Canadians, should we support our athletes in their pursuits even if it means devaluing the talents of others?

I can't speak for any other sport, but in the world of figure skating where judging can be biased, how can we applaud a Russian team who helped eliminate Canadians from medal contention at the Olympics, not through talent or hard work, but through politics?

In the studio Queen's drama a hit

By MATTHEW STRUTHERS

Studio 102 is an outlet for Queen's drama talent to show off their work that occurs four times a year.

In the newest incarnation, three interesting and insightful works were presented, Chaney Swoon, Collage and Shed Underwear.

Chaney Swoon, the first play of the evening, is written and performed by Andrea O'Farrel and directed by Tanja Nuhe.

In the one woman monologue, O'Farrel accurately portrays a girl whose sister has left to move on to bigger and better things. O'Farrel's work is well written and performed. She takes the audience through a rollercoaster of emotions, exposing an entire spectrum of feelings from the girl's childlike excitement and joy to heart-breaking disillusionment.

Chaney Swoon was a strong start to the evening. The second work of the evening is a surreal dance, Collage. Collage is aptly named as its influences are numerous. The work is the product of a collaboration between its director Lianne Hodgson and the entire cast.

"All of the performers have very different dance and movement backgrounds...each of the dancers had different exercises and ideas which they brought to the group," said Hodgson. It is this collection of exercises that form the structure of the collage. It quickly becomes evident that the work is less a product of strict choreography than of experiment. It truly is an organic piece of work, both in the process used for its creation, and its message.

Patrick Costello, a first year student, plays Trevor, a young autistic boy. In a role that could easily be played over the top, Costello hits the right note.

At one point in Collage, the dancers come together as cogs in an elaborate machine. The machine gains momentum until it finally flies apart.

Out of the Blue

Stages hosts a Blue Rodeo

CONCERT REVIEW

By STEFAN MURRAY

The fiddle and mandolin were the only things worth feasting on's senses upon at Stages Nightclub Tuesday, as the clothing impaired stayed home and Jim Cuddy showed up.

The normally bass and strobe heavy nightclub turned out to be a perfect venue for Cuddy and his band; the crowd was moderate, yet enthusiastic, and the acoustic was more than adequate.

The evening began with Adam Cohen taking the stage to a very accepting and intimate crowd. Cohen, who is known more for his father Leonard, than his musical prowess, managed to keep the crowd stimulated as they awaited Cuddy to take the stage.

His brand of mellow, moody folk-rock couldn't increase the energy in the bar, yet prevented the crowd from leaving early. He exited the show on a low note however, with an extremely forgettable organ strong cover of "Unforgettable." His vocal range was simply not able to capture the sweetness of the original. As Cuddy opened up with his "Second Son," a track from his newly released album All in Time the potential energy in the room was effectively released.

The country-rock powered set worked to create an intimate setting for listening while serving up enough power to provide an excuse for dancing.

An excellent rendition of "Whistler" and charged version of "All in Time" displayed the true power that Cuddy holds, as both a songwriter and a musician.

Able backed by Colin Cripps on guitar and Basil Donovan on bass, Cuddy manned a remarkable reserved rhythm guitar and displayed a piercing vocal style.

Cuddy exhausted the songs from his solo album during the performance and frequently had to pull a few titles from his Blue Rodeo bag. His solo version "It could happen to you" was clear evidence that Cuddy can hold his own without the aid of his former mates.

Cuddy and his four-piece back-up provided a great evening of entertainment on Tuesday, a perfect midweek distraction and a truly interesting collection of songs.

The Offspring Americana Columbia Records

By JIM WHITTINGTON

It's back to the basics for The Offspring on their latest release Americana. After a long association with Epitaph Records which produced Ignition, and the multi-platinum selling Smash, Dexter, Noodles, and the rest of the boys decided run out on their record contract so they could pad their wallets with a little help from Sony Music.

The long and ugly split from Epitaph must have taken its toll on the Californian punk rockers because their first big label release Lonny on the Hombres was a real waste of fifteen bucks, and sold about a tenth of Smash. Anyway, past is past, and this new album is a hell-of-a-lot better than their last effort.

You can tell Americana was pulled right out of the same mold as Smash. The album has that same energetic feel, and punk-ass subject matter that produced hits like "Self Esteem", and "Come out and Play", and gave them their first taste of commercial success. It's nice to hear the old Offspring again.

Most of Americana is pretty strong, with maybe the exception of "Feelings" which is laboring to listen to, and made me relive some of the pain of Hombres. Other than that, the rest of the album is really solid.

"Staring at the Sun" and "The Kids Aren't Alright" represent some of the Offspring's finest work, and a real indication of how far they have progressed as musicians.

"Why Don't You Get a Job", and "Pay the Man" have some really amazing acoustic guitar layering that sounds great and, surprisingly, fits in well with their sound.

Finally, "She's Got Issues" is an enchanting little tale of a loopy girlfriend, and relationship gone bad.

Americana isn't in the same league as Smash, but it's a pretty damn good album, and well worth the fifteen bucks. Giver a listen!

John Lennon Wonsaponatime Capitol Records

By ROB DE BELLEFUEILLE

Wonsaponatime is by no means a comprehensive collection of Lennon's commercial hits but obscure, incomplete and studio out takes from the artist's vast catalogue of music. With this release cynics might surmise that Yoko has become extravagant with her late husband's royalties but it is not our task to question Yoko; that belongs to her concert-goers.

The album will be relatively familiar to Lennon fans with several lesser known favourites and alternate versions of classics such as the rudimentary take of the later Lennon anthem "Imagine." The politically charged acoustic social commentary "Working class hero" reflects

Sex, kings and rock 'n' roll

The Philosopher Kings flirt with the court

CONCERT REVIEW
By LILIAN KIM

Little did I know that going to a concert required getting naked. Well, no one was completely naked, but clothes were taken off.

Canadian pop group The Philosopher Kings whipped their way into Kingston last Thursday to get down for an all ages show in Grant Hall. The theme of their show? Sex, sex, oh, and sex.

In a day and age where advertisements solely base themselves around hormonal rage, the Toronto band sold out to the desire. Lead singer Gerald Eaton couldn't have been more obvious.

"This song's about sex, you know?" a heavy-breathing Eaton cooed to a excited crowd. Eaton was referring to the band's hit "You Don't Love Me." After his stunning observation and a little bit of coaxing, a sprinkle of shirts, hosiery, bras and panties met the stage.

From then on it was all touching and grinding.

You have to admit that the Philosopher Kings do put on quite the show. Even for those who brush off mainstream pop, the performance is of a different entity. It's usually, they're good or they suck. If the circus show is decent, then the music becomes background, especially for those who were just there for one specific act.

The Toronto sextet came around the scene in 1994. Band members Gerald Eaton (vocals), James McCollum (electric guitar), Brian West (treated guitar), Jon Levine (piano), Craig Hunter (drums), and Jay Levine (bass) were signed to their first album only 7 months after forming. Because of their blend of jazz, soul, pop and with the addition of Eaton's interesting melodic interpretations, the band's first and second album Famous, Rich and Beautiful have been well received.

If anything, the musicians in the band are incredible with their respective instruments. Lead guitarist McCollum intensely moved up and down the frets while bringing back memories of the Italian Stallion with an interlude of "Eye of the Tiger" while pianist Jon Levine tickled the ivories with much passion that it was a pleasure watching his solos.

The strange thing about watching a Philosopher Kings concert is that it has the same primary effect as watching a lip-synch contest. The overt drama that possess the stage surpasses surrealism and inadvertently becomes cheesy.

Sometimes they're too painful to watch.

At one point of the night, Eaton dramatically wiped tears from his eyes after singing melancholy tracks. And after a few songs, he pulled a woman up on the stage to "seductively" serenade her — a motion that Eaton makes in every show.

The fabulous track "How Do You Sleep" stands out with its embittered message directed at former Beatle band mate Paul McCartney. The anger-ridden lyrics uttered by the disgruntled Lennon, clearly describe the contempt for his former collaborator after the bands less than amicable split.

"The only thing you done was yesterday And since you've gone you're just another day."

The piano driven foundation of the endearing ballad "Real Love" appears in its original form, which was later given a vibrant makeover by the remaining Beatles.

In the tradition of Lennon's mastery of ballads ("Jealous Guy," "Love") the engaging melodies "Grow Old with Me" and "Nobody Loves You When You're Down and Out" provide the definitive melancholy aura of the compilation. The catchy blues rock track "I'm Losing You" is a rhapsodic hidden gem that is indicative of Lennon's post-Beatle sound. The album features Lennon covering several classics. In "Only You," Lennon's version serves as a true testament to the artists wonder-fully gifted oscillating range.

Smith tones down and takes on the State

MOVIE REVIEW

By DAVID ANDERSON

One has to understand that I went into Enemy of the State expecting to be disappointed. In the wake of abysmal, like-minded thrillers such as Conspiracy Theory and The Net, I felt that I was fully aware of the insidious, all-encompassing power wielded by the government, corporations, Big Brother, whoever. The latest offering from producer Jerry Bruckheimer (Armageddon, Con Air) and director Tony Scott (True Romance, Top Gun), Enemy of the State succeeds where other recent conspiracy movies have failed by cutting straight to the chase: no unnecessary love interest, no longwinded descriptions of unbelievably powerful technologies, just Will Smith running, stopping to catch his breath, and running some more.

Smith plays Richard Dean, a Washington, D.C. attorney who comes into the possession of sensitive information which implicates a National Security Agency offices (Jon Voigt) with the murder of a high profile senator. Naturally, Voigt decides that the only rational solution to his problem is to shatter Smith's idyllic existence. Voigt erases Richard's identity, and hunts him down with the obligatory black helicopters. It's pretty standard stuff, but Scott's fast paced direction and great supporting cast makes up for the script's lack of innovation.

Using everything from convenience store security cameras to satellite images, Scott successfully conveys a sense of paranoia. Even in scenes with relatively little action, he is able to maintain tension by visually portraying the world as a place in which everyone is under constant supervision. However, it is when the action begins that Scott really shines. Once a character is under pursuit, the camera starts moving, stopping only when said character has either escaped, or died an excruciatingly painful death.

Whereas Will Smith gets top billing in the film, it is the supporting cast that provides Enemy of the State with energy and drive. Strong performances by Voigt, Gabriel Byrne, Jason Lee (Chasing Amy) and Lisa Bonet (of The Cosby Show fame) all overshadow Smith's toned down delivery of his usual cocky bravado. In fact, Smith's portrayal of an attorney on the lam is somewhat disappointing compared to his recent scene-stealing turns in Men in Black and Independence Day. It's hard to accept him as a vulnerable Everyman, when his best known roles have been as invincible heroes. Gene Hackman, however, steals the film. Hackman portrays an ex-NSA agent with a score to settle. He successfully personifies the film's anti-government sentiment, while at the same time proving that not one else can play an angry old man like he can.

As conspiracy theory/techno-thriller go, Enemy of the State breaks no new ground. However, as a straight-ahead action movie it offers a healthy dose of eye-candy for those starving for a summer-style blockbuster.

The collection of unpolished out takes, covers and rarities prove that the pony known as John Lennon still has a vast repertoire of tricks left in his Anthology. Wonsaponatime will aid in feeding the near insatiable appetite for material from the iconoclastic legend, and serve as a welcome addition to the nineties cesspool of trite, I mean music. Prediction: Soon the kids shall exchange their philosophy of "Getting Jiggy Wit It" to the more practical "Give Peace a Chance."

Duran Duran

Greatest EMI Records

By RENEE HUANG

There are certain symbols people always remember when they think back to the extravagant eighties: leg warmers, blue eyeliner, big hair and Duran Duran. I was first introduced to the sweet haven of eighties superstar rock as an easily influenced child of 10. As my older sister faithfully spun her vinyl Duran Duran on our family record player, I was mystified by the five British rockers - those smashing technicolour suits, that teased hair and oh, that golden voice...I was hooked.

Back in the day, Duran Duran was the shit. Even now, there's hardly anyone who can't appreciate the partying rock-a-billy of songs such as "Rio" or "Hungry Like a Wolf" that pound away at AJ's every Tuesday.

Duran Duran's Greatest Hits CD brings together old favourites which made the group stars. It also includes recent ballads such as "Ordinary World" and "Come Undone" that kept old faithfuls happy and made new fans of a younger generation. These two songs saw Duran Duran bridge the gap between drum and rhythm based '80s rock to the fluid construction of the vocally stacked music of ballad-thick nineties.

"Ordinary World" is the kind of song that saw most of us through our sweetest and most romantic moments with a high school sweetie. A musically intricate compilation of synthesized sounds, pure guitar and Simon Le Bon's passionate melodies show the band making the eighties to nineties transition with ease.

Duran Duran prove they have the wide range versatility and lasting power necessary in true stars - qualities distinguishing the divas from the one hit wonders.

For those who only know a few Duran Duran hits, their Greatest Hits CD offers a slick summary of sounds that showcase their inherent feel-good bop-a-bility — eighties excessiveness and lavish lifestyles at its best.

Various Artists
The Belly Soundtrack

Defjam Records

By ELI SCHUSTER

Well, I guess it has finally happened. What am I referring to, you ask? In my humble opinion, rap music has gone down the same path blazed by disco in the 1970s, and by stand-up comedy in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

Both of these earlier genres of entertainment became so popular that no-talents such as Disco Tex and the Sexolettes, Pauly Shore (ooh, he sucks), Adam Sandler and Roseanne Barr were able to burst on to the scene and ruin them (does anyone remember "Disco Sucks?")

After listening to the Belly Soundtrack, I fear that rap has become depressingly mediocre, just as disco had by the early 1980s, and most of the stand-up comedy featured on Bud Friedman's An Evening At the Improv.

D'Angelo's "Devil's Pie, Sauce Money" (oh man, I love rap nicknames), Jay-Z's "Pre-Game" and "Movin' Out" by Mya featuring Raekwon and Noreaga, are probably the best of this sorry collection of songs, but that's not saying much.

The Belly Soundtrack consists mostly of tired gangsta' poses, foul language, misogyny and a limited lexicon of "bitches" and "nines".

As I listened, I thought to myself, "Ok, so you're the toughest gang member on your block, and you've blown away some homies... yeah, yeah, been there, done that, now think of something new to rap about."

I tell you guys, the sheer lack of imagination on this CD is more depressing than a three-hour Leonard Cohen concert for starving children. Doesn't anyone do party songs anymore?

Obviously, I'm not going to recommend the Belly Soundtrack and I hope none of you, my loyal readers and followers, decide to part with your hard-earned cash to purchase it.

The Belly Soundtrack is pure O.G. — not "Original Gangsta", but "Obnoxious Garbage" that's lost its power to shock, yet will still likely take in the royalties.

Ms. Rolston's opus

CONCERT REVIEW

By JENNY MUIR

Shauna Rolston has played the cello in several prestigious concert halls around the world: Tokyo, Seoul, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Sao Paulo, Toronto, Montreal, New York, Washington, London, Paris, Amsterdam, Budapest, Rome and, most recently Kingston, Ontario, in our very own Grant Hall.

After attending her performance last Saturday evening, I am afraid to say that there is not much hope for me enjoying the next cello concert I go to.

Rolston's harmonious melodies were so entertaining that even a novice like me (if I may credit myself so much) would be hard pressed to find another cellist as enjoyable or accessible.

Accompanied by Lydia Wong

Barber's Sonata (Op.6) was a dramatic contrast to Beethoven's Sonata #2 (Op. 5 No.2).

Shauna Rolston's rendition of Barber's sonata contained three thematic movements that were like lyrical lines of dialogue between the cello and piano. In comparison to Beethoven's piece, Barber's music was more of a song, something one could dance to. For me, this made it more enjoyable to listen to.

Fourth-year music student Mike Anklewicz was pleased to see "something after the 1900s" on the program Saturday evening. He said that, "as a music student, I was glad to see Barber, a twentieth-century artist, included in the line-up rather than only classical or Romantic-era music."

Both Rolston and Wong were physically absorbed in the song, which added to the effect that their playing had on the audience. Rolston's breathing was literally audible and her foot would sometimes tap with the music, while Ms. Wong's entire body was engaged in the pieces that she played.

The musicians' enthusiasm for the sonatas they were performing, continued after the intermission. In fact, the third piece, Rachmaninoff's Sonata in G minor, was the most impressive of the evening. Performed in four parts, it was the third movement in particular that seemed to strike a chord with the audience and the cellist. It really did "tug at the heart-strings" as Rolston promised in her prelude to the piece. Long pauses were filled with soulful piano playing and the re-entry of the cello was perfectly synchronized so that together they reached an opulent conclusion.

We were lucky to have such a talented cellist perform at Queens — especially since she off to Italy in the new year, performing with the Gallois Quintet. However, I strongly urge anyone with an interest to seek out this skillful musician. Shauna Rolston was exciting to watch and it was a pleasure to listen to her music.

Out with the old

A promising future for new music when we go under the hype

By GREG DOLE

So you think music sucks today? Think again, punk. Sure there are the Third Eye Blind's of the world, but there is also Gomez. Their debut album Bring It On has a bit of everything of the Beck School of Music variety. At times you will think you are listening to the Grateful Dead, then the band takes on the uber-coolness of Dr. John and washes it through their mics with the vocals of a Tom Waits/Eddie Vedder type. Forget the Pearl Jam reference, though. There is no genre for Gomez - they go where music hasn't gone before.

In Britain they were recently awarded the Mercury Music Prize for best new album, beating out The Verve. Bring It On dances from big jams to catchy pop tunes to bluesy ballads to nonsense—like the song Tijuana Lady.

Gomez is five fellows straight out of university in Sheffield, England. The story of their hit record is the stuff of university legend. Seemingly like most students in existence, these guys drank, smoked, slept and finally, studied and crammed through university. However, in the process of the parasitical student lifestyle, they experimented with a four-track recorder to create something substantial. When I spoke to singer/guitarist Ian Ball, it was as though I was chatting away at a Kingston pub with some student musicians from Queen's. The only slight difference between the two is Gomez's record deal with Virgin Music/Hut Records.

As for offering advice to student musicians, Ball points to the importance of making a good demo. "We put everything into our demo," said Ball, "when it came time to play our album live, it took us a long time to figure out how to play most of the songs."

When you listen to their album, the lovely ballad "Tijuana Lady" will undoubtedly stick out. "Actually, Ben and I wrote Tijuana Lady when we were hung-over after a night of drinking Tequila. We woke up one morning and tried to make a song of as many Mexican clichés as possible. I mean, El Mariachi Desperado? I know that I'm no head honcho, I'll keep you warm in my safety poncho? We couldn't sing it without laughing!"

But Gomez is no joke. The band's live show at the Horseshoe Tavern was one for the ages and, not a week later, Gomez was on the Conan O'Brian Show! And when Conan thinks something is cool, well then it must be.

After speaking with Ball, I had to give him my copy of Canadian folkster sound alike. I heard it after I finished recording and couldn't believe the coincidence. Anyway, I wrote my song a few years ago while on mushrooms in a graveyard."

Lindy is definitely a colourful character. His schtick started with his family in Winnipeg. Of Icelandic descent, Lindy and his family toured around Canada in a yellow school bus singing Icelandic folk songs. Years later and still nomadic, Lindy ended up in Kingston. "I spent a while with a friend of mine who was in Medicine at Queen's. I used to play at the Wellington and the Toucan."

When I saw him play at the Reverb in Toronto a few weeks ago, I overheard someone gush "his falsetto kills me. It's so beautiful." So there you have it. Lindy recently played at Clark Hall Pub on Nov. 21, 1998.

Another group I caught up with at the Reverb was Asian Dub Foundation (A.D.F.). The only similarity between A.D.F. and Gomez is that A.D.F. almost won this year's Mercury Prize.

The group came together at a music technology workshop. Their album, "Rafi's Revenge," is a collection of various musical and political ideas. The track "Assassin" pays respect to the assassin of the British general who had ordered the infamous massacre at Amritsar, Punjab in 1919. "Free Satpal Ram" is another political diatribe, a rallying call for the freedom of Satpal Ram, an east Asian man imprisoned for defending himself against racist attackers.

While the band blasts their political agenda, their music is what catches the attention. Using the latest in technology, A.D.F. is not what you would expect of a so-called Asian musical group. They don't adopt the instruments of their ancestry. A.D.F. use the latest in sampling technology and deejaying technique to complement the electric bass and guitars of Dr. Das and Chandrasonic. Throw in the roasting and rapping of Master D, and deft-sampling of Hollywood film soundtracks, and the A.D.F. sound takes shape.

The self-titled album Lindy is my pick for best new album in Canada. The first single, "Ring around the moon," oddly enough sounds very similar to Radiohead's "Karma Police."

Said Dr. Das onstage, "As you can see, we use the traditional instruments from Japan, electric guitars, turntables and samplers. Our tradition is our instruments, our tool is dub." (He is referring to dub music, which defies description. However, dub is, loosely, a combination of varied sampling, bass lines and MC toasting.) Chandrasonic pin-pointed the band's perspective of what is tradition by saying, "When we remixed a Nasrat Fateh Ali Khan song for a compilation disc, some high-minded reviewer in the Times said that we took out the spiritual quality of the music. Because we weren't using instruments they think are Asian, we were losing the spirit of the music. These people love to tell us what is Indian or not. Fuck that."

Continues Master D, "To them a dot on the forehead is India. Madonna can go over to India and change herself and now supposedly represents things from India." With that, both performers launch into an attack on 'the industry'.

"We were first signed by Virgin Music France. The guy couldn't believe we were unsigned, however the music industry is so fucking racist in Britain," said Chandrasonic. "The music industry is a disease, it makes me so sick." Continues Master D, "They all go to their parties and do their lines. The lifestyle is selfish and boring."

Of course, the cynic in all of us would have to ask why they are hitting the hand that feeds them. Replies Master D, "We use our opportunity and position to put forth our message to more people. Before the MTV Europe awards we told the producers, you will have to censor us, we know you will after what we say. And they did." A.D.F.'s music and outlook is something worth listening to.

Finally, a band worth mentioning is Belle and Sebastian. They don't give interviews, and rarely do performances. The Boy with the Arab Strap is the new album, and its incredible.

And that's all that's fit to hear.

Spin City

Scratching into the unknown

"Who do these guys think they are? They're just playing records, it's not like it's that hard or anything."

Johnny Q. Student

If this comment sounds as familiar to you as it does to us, you should read on and find out about this whole DJ culture. So, let's really talk about DJing. We're not talking about the "DJing" that you heard at your Aunt Mary's second wedding, we're talking about the DJing that involves vinyl, skill and creativity.

The definition of a DJ has changed dramatically within the past 25 years. In the past, a DJ was simply there to play the music before the bands came on, but now DJs headline themselves.

To develop any kind of appreciation for today's modern DJ culture, it is important to first discuss the history and origins of DJing itself. It all began in the "Boogie Down" Bronx in New York City (circa 1973), with a man named Clive Campbell a.k.a. DJ Kool Herc. Here started out DJing at smaller parties and in parks where he attempted to maintain a consistent vibe at the party, by not leaving any "gaps" in the music; that is to say there would be no silence between songs.

The way he went about this was by using two turntables and later on, developing a "crossfader" on his mixer, which would allow him to mix between two songs seamlessly. To keep the flow of the party going, he would take the break of a song—a catchy riff or a funky beat—and loop it with another beat thereby creating an extended continuous beat containing simply the "break". This technique also spawned the term "breakdancers", who would create dance steps to these breaks.

Along with DJ Kool Herc, some innovators of the DJ culture were Grandmaster Flash and Grand Wizard Theodore. Grand Wizard Theodore was responsible for originating the "scratch". While cueing a record back and forth through headphones, Grand Wizard Theodore heard a funky, rhythmic sound, and DJing would never be the same. Flash then took DJing to another level by perfecting the "cutting" of records back and forth in perfect sync from one turntable to another.

Thus Hip-Hop music was created, and in the spotlight of the culture was the DJ. Soon other genres incorporated the two-turntable setup to keep the music going continuously. House, Techno, and Drum and Bass all have their origins in Hip-Hop, but differ in several respects. All these genres tend to have a greater number of beats per minute (BPM), but this is not their defining characteristic.

Referencing house in particular, the mixing of two or more songs together is longer (sometimes songs are played simultaneously for three minutes or more), and involves a complicated juggling of various facets of each song together.

The texture of the songs, and thereby the mixes, is changed by altering the low range (the bass) of the song, while tweaking the top range (treble) of another, or perhaps bringing out the mid range in order to emphasize vocals. Yet even this is not what a good House DJ should do.

House music should take you on a journey, wherein you do not simply hear the music, but feel it, and follow its path. This is why vocals are not necessarily present; vocals may or may not aid in propelling the journey, and therefore, may or may not be present.

The fact that house can be subdivided into an almost uncountable number of sub-genres (from deep, jazzy, garage, dark garage, to acid, goa, and disco house) is a testament to the journey-like nature of house.

Good house DJs create entirely new songs through a combination of the first few bars of one song in conjunction with the closing beats of another. The particular way in which a DJ does this will affect the nature of the journey. Because the quality and nature of the journey is dependent on how the DJ conducts this journey, the quality of a House DJ is reflected in the level of originality of their mixes, and also how moving and interesting the mix itself is. The technique of scratching over top of the songs (a technique borrowed from Hip-Hop and discussed below) is rarely employed used by some House DJs but adds yet another level to the feel a house DJ brings forth.

It is important to elaborate exactly what elements contribute to defining a "good DJ". The most essential components of being a respect DJ are possess the skills of beat matching and arguably, scratching. Beat matching is basically the ability to make slight adjustments in the speed of the turntable so that two records will have the same tempo, and therefore the beats will "match" during the transitional period between two songs.

Scratching is pretty much self-descriptive—it entails finding a short segment of a record and sending back and forth across the contact point with the needle with your hand.

As an expansion of these back skills of DJing, is the genre known as "Turntablism". The definition of a Turntablist is a person who uses the turntables not to play music, but to manipulate sound and create music. This is done using a variety of methods—complex scratching, beta juggling and body trick.

Beat juggling is performed by using two records and manipulating the arrangement of the elements (drum sounds, headnotes, etc.) from both to create a new rhythmical composition. Turntab-lism is recognized as the most intricate arena of DJing and also the field with the most potential for innovation.

DJing as mentioned earlier, use to be a mainstay of Hip-Hop, but has now expanded to other genres, such as, house, drum and bass and techno.

As Hip-Hop and these other genres increased in popularity, so has the art of DJing.

Now house DJs like Earl Cox and Derrick Cartercat basically headline clubs. With this increase in popularity, have come huge fanbases for these DJs and mass influence in pop culture music.

The next time you're in a club, rather than simply hearing what's being played, take some time and listen to what the DJ is doing with the music. A good DJ who interacts with the crowd and re-invents the music in their own way can be very exciting and entertaining to listen to and watch. A good DJ will build an atmosphere that will grip the crowd and feel unlike any other you'd feel on your typical night out. The experience will be well worth the effort invested in finding this sort of quality entertainment.

The Journal rebutts

A GREAT MAN ONCE SAID "It's better to burn out than to fade away." That man was Neil Young: folk legend, rock patriarch, country rambler, psychedelic survivor, doo-wop dabbler, synth-rock pioneer and solid blues-man. There is, perhaps, no greater and underappreciated nor misunderstood figure in the history of twentieth-century popular music, nay, of all time. The list of bands and artists who've covered his music and/or cite him as a significant influence reads like an eclectic music critic's record collection: Blue Rodeo, Dinosaur Jr., Treble Charger, Sonic Youth, Cowboy Junkies, Devo, Indigo Girls, even that Lindy guy — the list is far-reaching in genre and virtually endless in number.

From his early days in Buffalo Springfield where he penned the classic "Nowadays Clancy can't even sing" and his off and on involvement with Crosby, Stills and Nash, his work with James Taylor, Linda Ronstadt and Crazy Horse, to his more recent collaborations with Booker T and the MG's and Pearl Jam, Young possesses an unmatched longevity that extends to his less than fortunate personal life. Stricken at various points in his life with polio, epilepsy and debilitating back problems, Young survived. Despite the death of two friends from heroin overdoses, dealing with his parent's marital troubles and their messy divorce at age 14, a marriage failure of his own, the lengthy incarceration of his only brother, and perhaps most unfortunate of all, the diagnosis of both his firstborn sons (first and second marriage) with cerebral palsy (a disease whose origin in the female genes makes his story all the more heartbreaking), Neil Young has survived. Not only has he survived, he has brought the world much memorable tunes as "Down by the River," "Helpless," "Ohio," "Long May You Run," "Mr. Soul," "Old Man," "Heart of Gold," "After the Goldrush," "Like a Hurricane," "My My, Hey long, I don't know why, I just want to keep moving, keep running, play my guitar." Humble words for a man who's one shy of The Rolling Stones' record for the most number of entries on Rolling Stone magazine's greatest albums of all time (five), who's been inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame three times (for Buffalo Springfield,

Each year he hosts a two-day concert for the school that attracts artists from David Bowie and Tracy Chapman to Phish and Ministry. He was directly involved in the early stages of the development of the 'vocoder' - a device to aid communication between mentally-challenged children and their parents and educators. He was also the first to implement the vocoder in his experimental synth-rock phase in the early eighties, with great success.

John Robertson, author of "Neil Young: A Visual Documentary" encapsulates Young's career quite well when he says: "The prolific nature of his talent, plus his innate restlessness, makes him a frustratingly inconsistent, but eternally compelling, performer. [Over] thirty years into his professional career, it's still impossible to predict what he might do next. In an era when strategic marketing has robbed rock of its uncompromising raw edge, Neil Young is a musician and a writer to be treasured." And treasure him we should. He's a ragged jewel, a dreamer of pictures, a master craftsman, and apparently a great paintball player. Which brings us, conveniently, to today's subject: last Saturday's paintball showdown between members of The Journal and Golden Words.

The drive up was fairly scenic. We had hamburgers for lunch. The GW people talked about Japanimation for the better part of the day. I spent a lot of money. We lost. The drive back to Kingston was fairly scenic.

Says Mr. Young: "I just hate being labeled. I hate to be stuck in one thing. I just don't want to be anything for very long. I don't know why, I just want to keep moving, keep running, play my guitar." Humble words for a man who's one shy of The Rolling Stones' record for the most number of entries on Rolling Stone magazine's greatest albums of all time (five), who's been inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame three times (for Buffalo Springfield,

WAXIN THE DETECTIVES

A few issues ago, MISC. decided to start a revolution.

A cry rang out, rules were laid, and the stage was set for an event whose impact on the Queen's community was unmatched since the AMS's mock funeral for accessible education.

November 6th was the rebirth of the colouring contest.

Students gulped as the revolutionaries silently gathered their crayons like so many rifles. Two eagles flew overhead. A crowd squawked. The colourers let out a frenzied 'whoop' and began scribbling.

And scribble they did. Tirelessly. Entries flew through The Journal door like prize horses at a racetrack. The onus of judgement fell upon two experts in the field of colouring: Francis, Age 8 (below right) & Jade, Age 9 (below left)

Their task wasn't easy: to choose three winners out of the literally thousands of entries MISC. received. After hours and hours of arguing, squabbling, napping and Nintendo, they came to a consensus.

Congratulations to the winners, thanks to all those who entered, etc., etc., etc.

Another Editorial Comment

The world, meaning Queen's University, of course, in my always humble opinion, has become altogether too dependent upon electricity (remember the ice storm?) and computer technology (especially network servers). If anyone has any ideas regarding alternatives to these two silent evils that lurk behind our (seemingly) modest expectations, please call us at 545-2800 and claim your hero's ransom. All intelligent inquiries welcomed.

On a more sincere note, The Queen's Journal Reader apologizes for any inconvenience caused by the technical difficulties experienced by The Queen's Journal that were to blame for the delay in the release of this paper.

Who's afraid of The Queen's Journal Reader?

The most dangerous thing to do is stand still.
— William Burroughs
to Allen Ginsberg

Something is terribly wrong. I am not the kind of person who likes to write in the in the first person, and certainly not the kind of person who wants to go on record as writing what I am about to write. But all efforts are directed by the circumstances that created them. So here it is.

This is the third Reader of the year, and I'm still waiting for the Queen's community to write to me. I know you're out there — I saw you all at UltraViolet's launch, read you in their pages, read you in last year's Undergraduate Review and Quarry. Some of you I met in my studies in English, others just along the way. Some of you I've only imagined, others I haven't even dreamt of yet. But I know you're out there. What are you waiting for?

The Journal only exists for the students of Queen's University; The Reader is the literary arm of The Journal. So much has been made of the perceived apathy of our generation, so much hype regarding our torpid, jaded nature. But are the students of Queen's University really willing to subscribe to that?

University is about learning, maturing and honing the skills of our chosen discipline to a precise and measured point. But as much as it exists to guide us, it exists to misguide us, to send us down unexpected avenues that we would not have encountered otherwise. A great education should be as unsettling as it is valuable; in short, being at a university is about experimenting as much as it is about purely learning.

So here we are, alone in the post-secondary universe, full of creativity choice and freedom. Free to define and re-define ourselves as we choose. And where are the avant-garde?

I am prepared for the criticism that may follow these comments. I almost wish for them. Just to know that you're out there. The last two years have seen a resurgence of creativity at this university — the Union Gallery, the founding of The Reader and UltraViolet are testament to that — but it is time to push ahead. Queen's is what we make it. And I've got empty pages.

So over Christmas, go home, stay here, head out on your own, take chances and enjoy yourself. But take your notebook with you. Don't imitate what you see around you and don't keep your mouth shut. Don't shun diversity, adversity or inexperience. Drop all of your pretenses and write down exactly what it is you want to say, free of formula, precedents and expectations. Give up and start again. But don't stand still.

If my unsolicited advice, this very blunt appeal, has offended, then accept my apology — and my invitation to forward your work. I'd love to hear from you. These years, allegedly, are the best of your life; but again, they are what you make them. So to the neo-beats, the post-moderns, the millenials, the New Poets, whoever you are, whatever you call yourself — this is your neighbourhood, these are your walls to decorate.

And for the uninitiated, this is the experience and the experiment all in one. Here we are, and here it is. What are you afraid of?

— J.C. Bellringer

The majestic and strange world of Barbara Gowdy

BY TIM CONLEY

Oh, for a faith that will not shrink,
Thought pressed by thirst and fear,
That will not tremble on the brink
Of death, though life is dear.

Excerpt from an elephant song of thanksgiving, from Barbara Gowdy's The White Bone

Barbara Gowdy's sympathy for the freakish and her fondness for the perverse are unsettlingly honest. The portraits of repression one finds in her writing lack the wry detachment of Margaret Atwood; the 'freaks' have none of the comic hurlerous one finds in, say, Robertson Davies. In Gowdy there is — to borrow a phrase — something completely different. She has written lives of a levitating girl ("Presbyterian Crosswalk" in We So Seldom Look on Love), a two-headed man ("The Two-Headed Man"), a sexually dysfunctional family (Master Sandman), and, most infamously, a blossoming necrophiliac ("We So Seldom Look on Love"), later adapted for the screen as merely Kissed. I used to think I could say, with a neat chisel of sly authority, that Barbara Gowdy likes to explore the furthest houndaries of 'normal' and 'human.'

The White Bone, her latest novel, flattens that dreamy formulation. It's about elephants. There are no human characters at all, though the bloody effects of human actions loom darkly throughout. The language is an imaginative construct, too, based upon the perceptions and beliefs of the elephants, and a prefatory glossary and occasional footnotes are offered to help poor homo sapien readers understand that the term "longbody" signifies a cheetah, and that "certain fruits (such as that of the doum palm) ferment in the stomach and, if eaten in quantity, can cause intoxication." The White Bone has had an incredibly successful reception: a bestseller nominated for the Giller Prize, the Governor General's Award, and most recently the Rogers Prize, it is all the same a novel very much not of the traditional Canadian naturalist mode, and a challenge to some of the reader's most basic prejudices. It is also a very good book.

Asked whether, given the lengthy publicity gauntlet she's been running, she is yet tired of answering questions about elephants, Gowdy admits, "I'm not tired of talking about elephants so much as I am of just talking." Although she says she leads a "hermetic life" and is rather "antisocial" most of the time, she now faces the pending release of the book in the United States and Europe — Gowdy's novels, I've heard, are pretty popular in Germany, and "healthy advances" have been coming from other countries: "better than I've got for any other book." This spells for the author an even lengthier promotion run. (I am immediately apologetic for my own contribution to the anxiety, but she kindly assures me that in a telephone interview there are none of the pressures of image. "TV's the worst," she sighs. "You have to do your hair, they tell you to wear bright colours...")

In the course of The White Bone, the reader encounters the imagined characters and thoughts of cheetahs, mongooses, rhinos (no humans, or "hindleggers," though). I wondered why specifically elephants should be the subject of such a novel ("Why elephants, Ms. Gowdy?" asked the frowning interviewer, sternly leaning forward...). In our conversation, Gowdy quickly convinces me of her passionate concern for "the dire plight" of the animals who rarely live to their natural deaths, and of her contempt for the poachers who massacre them; she mentions the inspiration of seeing a documentary by Cynthia Moss on the subject. "If I'm true to the elephant nature, which I try to be, I'm dealing with a highly conscious, intelligent animal, as we humans measure consciousness." Elephants, she notes, have "big brains, highly convoluted," which actually expand, and "lots of complex emotions... This intelligence lent itself to fiction." Fair enough — but why give the fictional elephants powers of foresight and telepathy? Gowdy admits that she had to use those devices "to open up the narrative," but goes on to speculate whether these psychic powers, which we humans suspect do exist, but haven't been evidently forthcoming in ourselves, aren't to be found in a non-human species instead. (When I pause, and admit that I hadn't thought of it in that way, Gowdy laughs warmly.)

How concerned then, I ask, was she about not 'humanizing' the elephants?

Not just a guy with a radio show

Popular CBC radio host tours with his fourth book

BY LAURA MACINNIS

Stuart McLean speaks to Canadians across the country every week, through their radios. His CBC radio show, The Vinyl Café, has a captive audience who follow the antics of Dave and Morley, owners of a used record store who always seem to be falling into trouble, every Saturday and Sunday afternoon. McLean warms living rooms and across the country with stories that are equally charming and fun. He spoke with The Queen's Journal Reader at the Indigo Café in Kingston about journalism, the CBC, and his vision for our nation.

McLean, a native of Montreal, studied arts at Sir George Williams University. He took courses in theatre, English, and political science before settling on applied social science, a discipline similar to guidance and counselling.

But McLean knew he was not destined to be an academic. "It was radio that was my love," he said, but he did not pursue this dream while at school. "I was too shy to join the university radio club, I was afraid that I wasn't good enough, or something. That they'd make fun of me. And I used to walk by the radio, kind of wanting to go in there but not having enough courage to do that."

In fact, he didn't fall into journalism until several years after graduation, a delay he attributed to a lack of courage. "I always wanted to be writing and I always wanted to be in radio, but I just didn't have the confidence to do that," he said.

He was nearly 30 when he first stepped into the CBC and got a job in journalism, as a freelance interviewer. He worked as a researcher for Cross-Country Check-up, and then made radio documentaries for Sunday Morning for five years. McLean then moved on to Morningside, reading personal columns about life in small-town Canada, at the side of his long-term friend Peter Gzowski. When Morningside ended, he began doing his own show, a quirky balance of classical music and anecdotal stories, The Vinyl Café.

McLean is proud of The Vinyl Café, and says the move from non-fiction reporting to creative storytelling has been a rewarding change in his career. When asked where the inspiration for the show came from, he paused and said, "maybe it was just to try something new, to set something up that I didn't know I could do, and see if I could do it. Maybe I always wanted to do it, just like I was too shy to join the radio club... and then I had enough confidence to try."

Home from the Vinyl Café is a collection of stories from McLean's radio show, adapted to the book format as longer, more in-depth pieces about the life and times of the Vinyl Café, the used record store with the mantra, "We're not big, but we're small."

McLean now considers himself more of a writer than a storyteller. Home from the Vinyl Café is McLean's fourth book, fol-

'None of the things in this book actually happened'

Garry Shandling's truth-challenged autobiography

BY SEAN SPRINGER

Confessions of a Late Night Talk Show Host
By Garry Shandling with David Rensin
Simon & Schuster

"I want to put your mind at ease by telling you that for the last ten years I have been making love to you through the camera every night, and on all but two of those nights, I wore a condom. Those two nights I was drunk and forgot. Sorry."

—Larry Sanders from his "tell-all book"
Confessions of a Late Night Talk Show Host

Forever removed from the late night world, Larry Sanders rolls over, hikes up his trousers and sucks back his last drag of the flecting cigarette of fame. A note from the audience which had treated him so well lies on the feather pillow: "Larry, we had great sex, but the orgasms staled somewhere in the early nineties, and we're through. Kaput. You're the eight-track — the horse and buggy of late night — and I'm eloping with Conan." Rather than wander and wince during the hours of late night tv (à la Tom Snyder), Larry Sanders graciously accepts his cue, and humbly walks away.

Six months later... Larry Sanders spirals into a renaissance. His celebratory license of "deified pop icon/sex symbol" expired once the curtains dropped on his career and now the lonely noose of longevity swings overtop of his dining room chandelier. But wait, Larry Sanders is still a somebody ("You're fuckin' fascinating," his former producer Artie would remind Larry).

With his career on hiatus, the interesting parts of Larry's life have culminated to the potential of at least one heck of a magazine feature, and so, Larry picks up a pen, strolls down memory lane, scrolls out a few trashy anecdotes and faces the audience for one last set.

He writes: "Not to be metaphysical, but I, Larry Sanders am a fictional character. I do not exist. No one does. We are all energy, especially Don Rickles."

But who is Larry Sanders?

Sanders is the mouthpiece for comedian Garry Shandling's televised experiment in satire that began six years ago as an immediate cult explosion on HBO. The Larry Sanders Show was a pervasive, ingenious satire of the entertainment industry — a behind-the-scenes look at a fictitious network's immensely popular late night talk show that dealt with real stars, real issues and real egos.

Garry Shandling in a Larry Sanders mask

Much of the show's impressive comedy stems from this ancient conceit — the show within a show. But where The Larry Sanders Show truly deviated from its predecessors was in its brutal candour and acidic self-deprecation. Well-known celebrities regularly appeared as themselves in roles that could generously be called unflattering; Shandling himself is mocked with stunning regularity.

Shandling's magical mystery tour guided the viewer through the harsh and hilarious realities of pop culture that featured stars playing themselves in self-effacing and outrageous cameos. Here, on the show, Larry Sanders (played by Garry Shandling) and Ellen Degeneres (playing herself) wine, dine and end up entwined in the naked pretzel. Only here does David Duchovny seductively flash his testicles at Larry in an effort to snag the sexy talk show host. Lori Loughlin is a kleptomaniac, Bill Maher is a sex fiend and Jim Carrey is a self-centred asshole.

Shandling's humour is baked in a variety of blends such as his acrimonious relationship with Johnny Carson, the psychotic nature of his disillusioned ex-agent, Stevie Grant, and his first encounter with his former sidekick — the infamous Hank Kingsley.

With his talk show now months behind him, the man who coined the phrase "No Flipping!" is now asking you to flip — pages, that is. It's Larry's real departure from our lives as told to Garry Shandling in what he calls an autobiography, but what I deem as really more of an amusing anecdotal summary of a legacy — a thick red carpet for Larry to march out on proudly into the world of syndication and re-runs. 82 pages (one third!) of the text are photo clips of Larry interviewing and mingling with A-list celebs: David Letterman, Bridget Fonda ("...the night Bridget Fonda was on...the entire underside of my desk was charred beyond recognition.") Sting, Jerry Seinfeld, Helen Hunt, Sharon Stone. A few B-lists are featured as well: Richard Belzer, Steven Wright, Tim Conway, John Stamos, Ed Begley, Suzanne Somers ("Her famous thighmaster...is still one of the best dates I've ever had.") While very amusing, we learn little about Larry from the photography other than the fact that he was blessed with a lot of famous friends. The textual content itself is partitioned into short and concise monologues that span essential components of Larry's life in 1,000-word anecdotes, which are hilarious but more along the lines of a vast stand-up routine than a profoundly revealing autobiography.

Flipping back to 'Young Larry's' "unhappy and abusive childhood," Shandling writes of the emotional setbacks Larry conquered in his quest to succeed Johnny as the king of late night:

"I was rejected by everyone except for a very nice old man who gave me candy through the school fence and flashed me..."

...and his first orgasm:

"...Johnny [Carson] introduced Raquel Welch. She walked onto the set, and I just came on the couch. Another thing to blame on the dog... I felt good, but I was scared because I thought I was bleeding."

From there on, Shandling adopts a predictable chronological synopsis of Larry's life (Larry starting out as a young comic, Larry guest-hosting The Tonight Show, Larry finally getting his own show), but solidifies the narrative with the whimsical stories of a talented, egotistical yet insecure comedian's rise to the host's desk. These are Larry's Confessions, which bump up the laugh-o-metre to the third degree of humour.

In the chapter on "Celebrity Sex," Larry confesses that indeed, his show was a "sexual buffet" through which he had impressively slept with exactly 56 erotically-appealing women from Hollywood's A-list, including Carmen Electra, Frances McDormand, Mariah Carey, a Mariah Carey look-alike and Diane Sawyer.

He confesses that he and Steven Segal engaged in wife-swapping. He confesses that he and Cybill Shepherd romped in his dressing room before the inaugural show: "The sex was so good that we went the full five minutes, which meant I had to go on the air looking like shit!" And he confesses that his stints as a comedy writer for Rodney Dangerfield and Joan Rivers soured when Larry couldn't "convince Rodney to change 'I get no respect' to 'I get no pussy,'" and was unable in swaying Joan to change "Can we talk?" to "Can we fuck?"

Yes, the book's sexual explicitness is clear and a taste for sexual perversion is recommended for inquiring readers. Shandling's humour, however, is baked in a variety of

Diane Shoemperlen wins Governor-General's Award

BY TARA MANSBRIDGE

For Diane Shoemperlen, long-time author and Kingston resident, it was an affirmation of her work as a writer.

On Tuesday, November 17, Shoemperlen was awarded the Governor General's Award for Fiction, one of the highest honours Canada bestows on its authors.

"It really made me feel like writing does matter," said Shoemperlen in an interview with The Queen's Journal Reader.

The acclaimed Kingston author cited the acknowledged cliché about writers and their solitary work. "Sometimes," said Shoemperlen, "I was writing and I would think to myself, 'Gee, does anybody out there really care?'"

For Shoemperlen, this recent honour answers that question with a definitive 'yes.'

The Governor General's Literary Awards were established by Governor General Lord Tweedsmuir who made the first presentations on November 24, 1937.

Administered by the Canada Council for the Arts, the Governor General's Literary Awards are presented, in English and French, in the following categories: fiction, poetry, drama, nonfiction, children's literature (text and illustration) and translation.

Schoemperlen described the events and ceremonies at Rideau Hall in Ottawa with something that approached awe.

"They were fabulous," she said. "It was three days of being treated wonderfully well."

On Tuesday the authors were presented their awards, and treated to a gala dinner in the Tent Hall of Rideau Hall which Shoemperlen described as "absolutely sumptuous."

The next evening, the honourees read from their works at the Chateau Laurier Ball Room — a standing room-only event. To round off the events, Shoemperlen and her fellow recipients were officially presented to the House of Commons, where they were greeted with a standing ovation.

For Shoemperlen, the attention has been a little astounding, the constant interviews just a little overbearing. When asked if she was tired of the media attention, the Kingston author replied, "To be honest, a little bit."

"It's kind of overwhelming to suddenly get all of this attention," she said, adding a quick caveat, "I'm not complaining."

The work which garnered Shoemperlen all this attention is Forms of Devotion, a collection of short stories and art. The work marries pieces of art from the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries.

"The idea was not new for me," explained Shoemperlen. "I think I have this interest in visual art because I am somewhat of a frustrated visual artist."

The main character in Shoemperlen's last work, In the Language of Love, was a collage artist, and Shoemperlen drew inspiration from her art. Forms of Devotion is itself a collage, she explained.

As the idea for the book formed in her head, Shoemperlen began collecting volumes of copyright-free illustrations — illustrations which were over 75 years old. With the illustrations came inspiration for the text, and the award-winning Forms of Devotion was born.

The Governor-General's award is not a new experience for Shoemperlen. An earlier collection, The Man of My Dreams, was nominated for the Governor-General's award and, last year, Shoemperlen was on the jury which selected the award-winners. Thus, Shoemperlen is sympathetic to the rigorous process the jury had to go through to make its decision this year.

"I have some idea of how hard, how terribly, terribly hard it is to make these decisions," she said, explaining that, last year, she had to read 115 books before the short-

On Borrowed Time, Love Among the Ruins

The haunting life and tragic death of Paul Monette

BY MAC MCARTHUR

Paul Monette died of AIDS in 1995, almost 10 years after his partner Roger Horwitz ("the happiest man I ever knew.") Monette wrote "out" novels in the seventies when there was little gay-lit available. He tormented himself with Hollywood screenplays when studios were forcing the love interest re-sexed. And this was all after years of the closet. Fag-bashing in high-schools is actually quite new. Before Stonewall, homosexuals just didn't exist in polite, family society. A lot worse than today's bloody nose in the school-ground and the common scream of "Faggot." Then, you didn't even know you were alive. Just different. "Alone" is too simple a comment.

Integrity is too small a word. Monette writes directly into honest loves and pain, in the face of a society that assigns margins and will not care more.

Monette rose to literary prominence with his AIDS memoir Borrowed Time. The first line is "I don't know whether I will live to complete this." The book concerns itself with the failure of a government and a medical system to care about its dying citizens, and, perhaps more importantly, about Monette and Horwitz's combined battle. Monette's later autobiography Becoming a Man: Half a Life Story won the National Book Award in the United States. That book detailed his closets until the night he met Roger. Mostly narrative, except for the first four pages of poetic diatribe:

And every time we dance, our enemies write like the witch in Oz, melting, melting — The Nazi Popes and all their brocaded minions, the rat-brain politicians, the wacko fundamentalists and their Book of Lies.

Our stories have died with us long enough. We mean to leave behind some map, some key, for the gay and lesbian people who follow — that they may not drown in the lies, in the hate that pools and foams like puss on the carcass of America.

A friend suggested the book would have been better without the beginning rant. And his question stands: "Should art be political?" A clear answer.

Unfortunately, Monette's books of poetry are overlooked. They contain wealths of angers that many are too ashamed to acknowledge. As if his inclinations through AIDS never existed. Watching a partner die step by step, especially when you know your own body is on the same trail. The poems are truth and a difficult truth to read. And a difficult structure to read. The lines just continued and continued without break. You literally have to come up for air. As Monette writes "I wanted a form that would move with breathless speed, so I could scream if I wanted and rattle on and empty my Uzi into the air." And this challenges a reader to dig. Matching the anger is the love. "Love Alone" is subtitled "Eighteen Elegies for Rog." "The Worrying" is the finest and opens:

The worrying ate me alive day and night.
These land mines all over like the toy bombs dropped on the Afghans, little Bozo jack-in-the-boxes that blow your hands off at 3 am.

A childhood identifies an adult crisis in the darks of an early morning. And the awesome helplessness. The poem is more about Monette's attempts to care for the inevitable than Rog's decline. There are memories of travels to Greece. But mainly the daily grind of dealing with a coming death. The mere fact that a wisp of pesticide on a leaf of lettuce might cause another medical crisis. The compulsive cleaning of everything that might contain a germ. Rog is not going to escape this terminal fate and these two men understand:

Monette rose to literary prominence with his AIDS memoir Borrowed Time, the first line of which is "I don't know whether I will live to complete this."

All summer long I dripped your veins at 4 and midnight, watching every drop as if it was sight itself. The poem "Your Sightless Days" confronts these slopes. It's not a blindness that arrives in an instant. It's a daily slide with some recoveries. It's war. The left one gone in April overnight, two millimeters on the right side saved and we fought for those. That knife of light and beaten ground raging for day. Like the Warsaw ghetto.

Every cough. Every bump. Would nothing ever be nothing again, cramming you with zinc and Haagen-Dazs, so wild to fatten you up I couldn't keep track of what was medicine, what was old wives' ... but see THERE WAS NO MEDICINE, only me

The chores of care. He confesses his fears. His tiredness. Buying the cemetery plots. "The chamber of horrors in my head." This is not just about AIDS and homosexuality. It's also about friends with cancer or suspicions of cancer. The people we bury and how we bury them. And how we send them out of our lives. And then how we let them back again in grief and recovery. There are no sudden highway accidents here. No surprises. Death builds and chooses its own time.

And chooses blindness to warn you have no control.

Monette's introduction to "Love Alone" opens with a quote by Wilfred Owen, but quickly dismisses any comparison between the loss of one generation and a past one. Death in a foreign field is not dying at home. A War Office telegram is not a daily list of meds. AIDS is clearly placed within the tragedies of the twentieth century. This one happens to be his. He advises libraries to file this book under AIDS and not Poetry. The focus is on who has been in the trenches. And who got the ticket on the zeppelin observing. The closet is singularly destructive. Collaborators exist. Gay society is split by health status. In the poem "Half Life" he writes:

I open the door to the morning and half the city's Capri and half Buchenwald

Monette's later poems became even more direct and stark:

Hate the Reagans and their facile cancers,
all straight people with lives and my brothers who flee to the continent having buried their allotment.

This is from "Ed Dying." The word "hate" is used repeatedly. Ed seems to be a friend who has to hide his AIDS and has shrunk into his apartment ("dwindling in secret") after a lifetime filled with glamour. "Ed who has met them all - Cary, Hitch, Her Serene Highness." There is much in the poem of attempting to find the right drugs ("and I need refills like a one-arm bandit") long before the current cocktails existed. It's a world of despair with few rays of hope from "petty bureaucrats and barbaric priests." And an acknowledgment that good people sometimes have to escape to grieve and recover and rest.

There is much in the poem of attempting to find the right drugs ("and I need refills like a one-arm bandit") long before the current cocktails existed.

But then Paul meets a new man and finds the energy to love him. In a love that has the immediate limits of time.

Like the poppies rioting yellow on every cliff edge memorizing fast their one day open wide, west of yesterday, east of summer,
holding on for life to such high places as we live, the difficult house of joy.

Integrity is too small a word. Monette writes directly into honest loves and pain. And into a society that assigns margins and will not care more. His poem "The Very Same" opens with walking out of a funeral chapel. An insensitive relative ("An idiot cousin") tells him to turn Roger's page over. And then Monette constantly returns to words being part of a page, and pages building to a book. "There was no page before I caught you." Roger was his book. The poem is intimate, wise and intimidating. "Is this shit from the Bible? The sayings of Dr. Kubler-Ross?" The poem closes with how Paul and Roger would deal with the same kite. Holding it together, but releasing it in separate ways. Complementing each other. Hard stuff to read as it surely was to write.

Paul Monette

I only wish my ghosts were happier today, after seventeen years of real life. Not that the moments of our meeting ever loses its shine, or the knowledge that one will ever have to make do with shadows. But the fevers are on me now, the virus mad to ravage my last fifty T cells. It's hard to keep the memory at full dazzle, with so much loss to mock it. Roger gone, Craig gone, César gone, Stevie gone. And this feeling that I'm the last one left, in a world where only the ghosts still laugh. But at least they're the ghosts of grown men, proof that all of us got that far, free of the traps and lies. And from the moment on the brink of summer's end, no one would ever tell me again that men like me couldn't love.

list was even drafted. Schoemperlen is not surprised that her work was passed over last time she was nominated, yet awarded this time.

"Winning something like this is so inspiring."

— Diane Schoemperlen

"The juries are totally different," she said. "It depends as much on the taste of the jury."

Schoemperlen did say that she hoped the award reflected her maturation as an author.

"Over time you hope as a writer your work will improve," she said.

Schoemperlen is a little bit frustrated with all the attention she is receiving because of her award.

"Winning something like this is so inspiring," she said, but media interviews and touring has kept Schoemperlen from capitalizing on that inspiration.

When asked if Schoemperlen had any advice for the up-and-coming Kingston writers, the brand new celebrity had this to say: "It's kind of cliché, but it's true: don't give up. You have to be stubborn and determined. It helps to write a little bit every day."

Kingston HOURS Benefit 'quiet but powerful'

By TARA MANSBRIDGE

The reading, much like the Kingston literary scene, was quiet but powerful.

The purpose of the event was a benefit for Kingston Hours, an alternative currency which was introduced in Kingston approximately one year ago. As Michael Crumme, a Kingston author and reader at the event, explained, the concept of the hours currency was first introduced in Ithaca, New York as an "alternative community currency."

Hours is a barter system based on paper currency, the Kingston Hour. In exchange for time worked, an employee can be paid in Hours, which then can be bartered for goods and services at businesses which participate in the Hours system.

"It's giving control back to the community of their local economy," said Crumme, who explained that, because Kingston Hours cannot be used outside of Kingston, the system ensures that money made in the community stays in the community. Crumme called the system a "form of participatory democracy" and said that Kingston Hours creates "much more wealth in Kingston than the Canadian currency."

The MC for the evening was Modern Fuel Gallery's energetic Sandra Jass. After a quick stint at the microphone, Jass gave over the floor to the first reader, Mary Cameron, whose recent book of poetry Clouds without Heaven was the source of all the poems she read that evening. Cameron, a former editor of Quarry

Magazine and Prism International, explained that her latest collection of poetry revolves around her interest in the relationship between the painter Paul Cezanne and his wife, a woman he painted often, but communicated with rarely.

Cameron's poems did not live up to the injunction she gave just before she started reading ("If they seem kind of incomprehensible, don't worry. Just listen," she said.) Instead, they flowed, one into the other, like a painting being created before one's eyes. Although every now and then one struggled to make out the shape of the thing being presented, at no point did you feel you didn't understand what was going on.

Up at the mic after Cameron was Michael Crumme, a poet who seems to energize and settle his audience all at the same time. Crumme was just back from a cross-Canada tour promoting his new collection of poetry, Flesh and Blood, although the prolific author also has another new collection out, Hard Light. Crumme, who readily admitted he was already tired of reading his recently published works, instead read, self-indulgently (his comment), a small collection of new poems.

My personal favourite of the group was "The Late MacBeth," a poem about a man suffering from Lou Gehrig's disease. Crumme gave a short introduction to the piece, something I wish more authors would do, and added just before he began reading that "it rhymes, I apologize for that." The poem was well-crafted, a careful look at what it feels like to slowly become paralytic.

The majority of the other poems Crumme read were self-described "cemetery poems." After Crumme stepped away from the mic my companion commented, quite astutely, that Crumme seems to visit cemeteries often in his work, revealing a concern with lineage and the threads that bind family and community.

During the brief intermission, Elizabeth Greene, editor of We who can fly, a collection of Adele Wiseman's essays, read Tarot cards for those interested. Greene was supposed to have read her poetry, but was feeling a little under the weather and volunteered to do this other type of reading instead.

First after the break was Joanne Page, who read a moving collection of poems about her relationship with Bronwen Wallace. The collection was nine years in the making, as Page struggled to deal with the death of her friend and the consequent mythical status Wallace took on for the Kingston literary community after her death.

The reading was obviously difficult for Page, and was made more gut-wrenching by frequent interruptions by a local itinerant, an unfortunate consequence of having open-forum type readings. Overall, though, the poems were touching, sounding more like confessionals than purgations of grief.

The final reader of the evening was Eric Folsom, a reader who approached the microphone as if it was a snake he was about to charm. Folsom's most recent collection is called What kind of love did you have in mind?, but he read all new material, except for one audience request.

All in all, the reading was a typical Kingston success. While it brought out great talent, and a good number of people to listen and applaud it, the donation basket which circled the venue, the ever-popular Sleepless Goat, was decidedly poor. The reading, while well received, garnered less support than hoped for and, by any estimate, was not well-attended. Hopefully the poor turnout does not bode ominously for the HOURS project, an ambitious and well-intentioned plan that is struggling to find purchase in Kingston's cut-ravaged economy.

In Memorium, Ted Hughes

By J.C. BELLINGER

Ted Hughes, Britain's Poet Laureate and one of the country's greatest poets, died on October 28, 1998, following an 18-month battle with cancer. He was 68.

A brief statement, issued from his publishers, Faber and Faber, read: "After a valiant 18-month fight with cancer, Ted Hughes died (October 28). The loss to his family is incalculable." Hughes died peacefully in his home and had asked that friends and family keep news of his struggle with cancer secret.

Despite his fatal illness and advancing age, Hughes continued to garner critical acclaim and accolades right up until the time of his death. His Tales of Ovid, published in 1997, was awarded the Whitbread Book of the Year Award, one of Britain's more prestigious literary prizes. Earlier in October, Hughes had been honoured by Queen Elizabeth by being awarded the Order of Merit, an exceptional distinction that is limited to only 24 living members. Hughes was discovered by another one of the 20th Century's greatest writers, T.S. Eliot.

Critics and fans alike were surprised by the sudden and unassuming launch of Hughes' book of poetry, The Birthday Letters, last year.

Chiefly known for his powerful depiction of the savagery of nature — the word "Darwinian" is often applied to his work — the poems in The Birthday Letters deal openly with the 1963 suicide of Hughes's wife, the poet Sylvia Plath. Hughes' previously unbroken silence regarding Plath had led some critics to call Hughes hard-hearted and cold; Plath's grave has been consistently vandalized by those who would remove Hughes' name from it. Hughes struggled quietly with his personal grief regarding Plath's death for 35 years before the publication of The Birthday Letters.

Alice finds love after all

Alice Munro, overlooked at this year's Governor General's Awards, has been awarded the prestigious Giller Prize for her latest collection of short fiction.

Munro's latest collection of short fiction, The Love of a Good Woman, was chosen as the winner of the $25,000 prize, besting works by Wayne Johnson, Greg Hollingshed, Gail Andreson-Dargatz and Barbara Gowdy. Gowdy and Johnson were also nominated for the Governor General's this year. Familiar Canadian figures Peter Gzowski, Margaret Atwood and Guy Vanderhaeghe comprised the Giller's jury.

Munro, 67, has been awarded the Governor General's Award three times previously, the latest of which occurred in 1986 for The Progress of Love. The Governor General's jury drew heavy criticism this fall when Munro's latest work was not included as one of the finalists. This year marks the first time that Munro has won the Giller.

In only its fifth year, the Giller Prize has become one of the most prestigious literary awards in Canada. Established by Jack Rabinovitch in memory of his late wife, literary journalist Doris Giller, the prize now rivals Governor General's Awards in terms of hype and outright ceremony. This year's presentation, an often glitzy, glamorous affair, was televised for the first time. Recent winners of the Giller include Mordecai Richler and Margaret Atwood.

Literary News In Brief

Ian McEwan Wins Booker

English novelist Ian McEwan has been awarded the 1998 Booker Prize for his novel, Amsterdam.

McEwan, a finalist for the Booker on two previous occasions and a winner of the coveted Whitbread Novel of the Year Award in 1987, was selected over such literary luminaries as Julian Barnes and Patrick McCabe.

Previous winners of the award in recent years include Graham Swift, Pat Barker, Roddy Doyle and Canadian writers Arundhati Roy and Michael Ondaatje.

José Saramago awarded Nobel Prize

Left-leaning and relatively unknown Portuguese novelist José Saramago has been awarded the 1998 Nobel Prize for Literature.

The 75-year old author's body of work, full of satire and allegory concerning Portuguese history and politics, drew the attention of the Nobel jury despite being well outside what is considered the mainstream of Western Literature.

Saramago's novels include Baltasar and Blimunda, The history of the siege of Lisbon and most recently, All the Names

Fiction

Sarah Conley
by Ellen Gilchrist
Back Bay Books

Gilchrist's powerful tale of the protagonist's crucial mid-life choices and their implications somehow brings intelligence and energy to obscenely familiar territory. At once both vibrant and fragile, the National Book Award-winning Gilchrist remains in top form.

—J.C.B.

dissed banded nation
David Nandi Odhiambo
Polestar Book Publishers

Odhiambo, a native of Kenya living in Vancouver, has finally delivered what authors have been looking for for decades: a truly post-beat novel. Energetic, wildly gonzo and authentically trip-hop, Odhiambo's jumpy and edgy prose rattles down the page in a giddy fervour. An exciting and invigorating young voice.

—J.C.B.

Sex is Red
Bill Gaston
Cormorant Books

Notable for his impressive range and sparse, understated prose, Gaston shows considerable promise as a writer of short fiction in this, his third such collection. Technically exact and as well-executed as his stories are, however, Gaston's prose occasionally and unconvincingly dips into the banal and sometimes even worse. Still, the collection's finest passages are worth its weakest.

—J.C.B.

Nerve
Barbra Leslie

Hey Now! Jeffery Tambor as Hank Kingsley. And it's getting really late, and we need to fill the space, and I know that he wouldn't really mind. Blame it on the 'server.' How ironic, indeed. Alanis would be proud. O.K., maybe she is anyway.

blends such as his acrimonious relationship with Johnny Carson, the psychotic nature of his disillusioned ex-agent Stevie Grant, and his first encounter with his former sidekick — the infamous Hank Kingsley ("The first time we spoke I opened my portfolio and shouted, 'Hey, I'm trying to sleep! Show that megaphone up your ass!').

While Sanders's obsession with genital arousal and sexual penetration is relayed by Shandling in his provocative, tasteful and hilarious narration, that isn't the reason why I love this book. Nor do I love this book because I'm a psychologically addicted fan of The Larry Sanders Show. This book is brilliant

Gutter Press

Funny and precise, Nerve is everything a young writer's work should be: uncompromising, precocious and slightly unrefined. Leslie's true talent lies in knowing how to take her audience perfectly to the edge of true, dark bitterness and then retract, just at the right moment; the novel's episodic, scenario-driven structure is used to perfect advantage.

—J.C.B.

Humour

J. Crewd
Justin Racz
Doubleday

This J. Crew parody will have you squealing with joy. A sophisticated brand of humour using subtle wit, the jokes are laid out in J. Crew tradition in the form of the "nine-in-one" jacket, the "Li'l Pimper, Slim Daddy" line and the best in "versatile black," helping you to kick out and look hot to trot at your next funeral. J. Crew was never this funny.

—S.S.

Bad Jobs

Cardlin Brooks, ed.
Arsenal Pulp Press
You won't find uproariously laughter here, rather an engaging, quirky, often serious anthology of short stories of educated people working dreadful hours with horrid colleagues under harsh working conditions. It's a collection of heroes for the working class, people who expose life's assholes for what they really are — assholes. Interesting and real, Bad Jobs should prepare the Ph.D. student for golden arches and major headaches.

—S.S.

How to Heal the Hurt by

Hating
Anita Liberty
Bantam

Performance artist Anita Liberty starts off strong but soon reduces herself to nothing more than just another angry, bitter, pathologically-obsessed Alanis without a cause, made all the more pitiful owing to Liberty's pretense of artistic expression. Abandoned by her boyfriend of three years for another woman, Liberty devotes her career to "getting even" by humiliating him in public. How ironic that it is Liberty herself who should be embarrassed by this lengthy and unfunny diary entry masquerading as a book. Someone should let Liberty know that it's been said that resentment is renting out your brain for free.

—J.C.B.

Poetry

Digressions of a Naked Party

Girl

Sky Gilbert
ECW Press

Digressions opens with the oddly-affecting "Ode to William Jefferson Clinton," proceeds to the highly-accurate "Why Kathy Lee Gifford is just like the United States of America" and ends on the somber and murky "Island of Lost Tears." In between the always outrageous blows sugar-sweet satirical kisses...and irreverent but timely winks to everyone from himself to, well, the President of the United States of America. One of Canada's most controversial and under-appreciated writers/poets/actors/filmmakers.

—J.C.B.

Non-Fiction

Body Music
Dennis Lee
Anansi

This collection of Lee's essays reveals his significant range. Known especially for his poetry, Lee is a versatile and remarkably insightful thinker-at-large and anthologist, as his many publications suggest. This collection — anecdotal, scholarly and genuinely thought-provoking — only confirms Lee's considerable status as a man of letters.

—J.C.B.

Secrets of a Telephone Psychic
Frederick Woodruff
Beyond Words

At a modest 147 pages and written in a surprisingly down-to-earth style, Secrets of a Telephone Psychic is an entertaining and informative guided tour through the expanding business of selling spiritual information over the phone. Although Woodruff, a self-proclaimed "spiritual counselor," does give plenty of insightful analysis of this world, the book's strongest moments come when the author recounts some of the conversations he took part in during his 20 years as a Honolulu telephone psychic. The descriptions of these calls are both outrageously funny and considerably disturbing, often at the same time.

The book also includes the handy essay "How to Call a Psychic and Not Go Broke."

because it reflects the most innovative brand of satire in the media today, a satire that paints an authentic portrait of the "Me First!" industry using easily identifiable celebrity personalities. Accounts of malicious back-stabbing, egotistical self-advancement and Larry's tale of Dick Cavett's "hit out on Johnny" are artificial constructions of reality, and thus their potential is recognizable, tangible and imply an implicit immortality in show business.

This book is brilliant because it reflects the most innovative brand of satire in the media today, a satire that paints an authentic portrait of the "Me First!" industry using easily identifiable celebrity personalities.

For one, the materialistic emphasis in show biz is best characterized in Larry's advice on how to be a successful agent: "Leo [my agent] drove a Volkswagen Bug, which is one of the reasons I finally left him... I have a much better agent now. He drives a new shiny black Porsche, so people know he means business."

The book is also simply a lot of fun. Light-hearted and engaging, Garry Shandling's sense of humour is unmatched for its candid appeal and self-effacing approach. You can't not want to sit and talk with Garry Shandling and his alter ego, Larry Sanders.

For both fans and non-fans of The Larry Sanders Show, Confessions of a Late Night Talk Show is a light, conducive read and an ideal stocking-stuffer. Like its televised cousin, the novel retains the essence of Garry Shandling's contempt for the problems inherent in show biz, which is expressed through the honest, personal and penetrating anecdotes of this amoral hero for the nineties.

And on that channel, you may now flip.

From Coast to Coast with Michael Crummey

An Interview with Kingston's favourite Newfoundland writer and/or Newfoundland's favourite Kingston writer

By Bob McGill

Queen's students might recognize Michael Crummey from the OPIRG office at the Earth Centre in the JDUC, but he is also one of Canada's most brightly-shining young writers.

This fall he has been on tour promoting two new books: Hard Light, his second book of poetry, and Flesh and Blood, his first short-story collection. The Reader caught up with Michael during a break in his cross-country travels to talk about life on the road and future destinations.

QJR: Let's talk about the tour. What's it been like?

MC: I started September 10, and since then I've done something like 17 cities and 23 readings from St. John's to Victoria to Yellowknife, plus some high school readings, so basically I've crossed the country from one end to the other and gone up north as well. Next week I go to Labrador for 10 days and I'm going to do a bunch of readings up there, which is neat, because that's where Hard Light started, with a trip I took with my dad down the coast three years ago.

QJR: What kinds of reactions do you get in Newfoundland? Do they differ from reactions in other places because of the subject matter?

MC: I get some of my best turn-outs in Newfoundland, and I think that's partly because I've gotten more attention there than in other parts of the country. I was really nervous, actually, when I went down in September, because I've been away 11 years now. I keep waiting for someone to jump up in the middle of a reading and say, "You're a fake Newfoundlander! Who do you think you are, writing this stuff!" But nobody has; the response has been great. The people just seem really happy that I'm doing it.

When I sit down and write, I'm just writing. I'm not thinking. 'Is this going to be a book? Is it going to get published? Who's going to read this?' That just distracts. Once it's done, then I start worrying about those things. But the important thing is to write stuff that will make you happy as a writer.

QJR: When you're writing something like Hard Light, how much is it in your mind that you're going to be going back to Newfoundland and reading it to people?

MC: I don't really think about stuff like that when I'm writing. To a certain extent, I haven't written about anything but Newfoundland. Well, that's not entirely true, but if you look at it, I've published three books, and two of them are set almost entirely in Newfoundland and Labrador, and one of them has a fair chunk about Newfoundland, so it just feels like what I do. And the next book I'm hoping to work on is going to be set in Newfoundland, as well, so it wouldn't be good if I did worry about those sorts of things. When I sit down and write, I'm just writing. I'm not thinking, "Is this going to be a book? Is it going to get published? Who's going to read this?" That just distracts. Once it's done, then I start worrying about those things. But the important thing is to write stuff that will make you happy as a writer. There are so few rewards for writers in Canada — except for the "Big Six," or however many there are that make a living at it — that the writing, enjoying the writing, has to be what keeps you going. And I think I'm closer and closer to that place.

QJR: Any real horror stories from the tour?

MC: The person who organized the reading for me in Calgary had booked the space two months before I got there. When he booked it, it was a coffee shop. When I got there, it was a bar. It had changed ownership in the meantime. So I got there and there were black lights and really loud music. It was 7:30 in the evening and people were already drunk. They had to go the back room and unscrew a light and put it into a track out in the room where I was reading so I could see what I was doing.

They turned the music off downstairs where I was reading, but not upstairs, so I was reading and there was this "THUMP THUMP THUMP" the whole time and the people in the pool room beside us were shouting, "What happened to the fucking music? Turn on the fucking music!"

QJR: As you were reading?

MC: As I was reading. And people were coming downstairs to find out what was going on, but they sort of saw me and figured out what was going on and turned around and got the hell out of there. I think there were maybe six or seven people who had come for the reading. I thought it was kind of a metaphor for being a writer in Canada, because you have a very small audience, and there's all kinds of other shit going on around you, and sometimes it seems like nobody's listening. It was just kind of funny. At that point you just have to laugh at it and do the best you can. That was the worst, for sure. Nothing else even came close.

QJR: What about the high schools?

MC: The high schools were okay. High schools are always iffy. When you're reading at high schools, you have to think, "There's at least one person here who's getting something out of this." Because it may be only one person, but there is at least that one person. A couple of years ago I read at a bunch of high schools in Newfoundland and I went up to Twillingate. They brought in a couple of English classes, and most of them were there just because it was a chance to be out of class. A bunch of guys had timed their watches to go off one after the other as I was reading. I was reading this very sensitive poem about this kid I knew when I was really young who got run over by a Coca-Cola truck, and this guy let out, right in the middle of it, the loudest fart I have ever heard in my life. What do you do? I just kept reading. But after the reading, there was a girl who came up to me. She was dressed all in black. It was obvious that she was a complete outsider, that she just didn't belong where she was. She came up and started talking to me, and she said, "I write poetry, too." And we talked about that for a little bit. So it was really nice — after this awful reading where I'd thought, "I'm never doing that again" — to have this person come up and to know that it was really important for her that I'd been there.

QJR: When you were in high school, did you ever have that person come in and be there for you?

MC: Yeah, and I met him this year, actually, on the tour. His name's Kevin Major, and he's a writer from Newfoundland. It was the only time we ever had a writer come in to the school. I remember him reading from his second book, where this father comes home drunk on Christmas Eve and falls into the Christmas tree and says, "Jesus Christ, my face!" and I thought, "This guy gets to swear, in school, and nobody says anything! That's what I want to do! I want to be like that!" And so I met him. He was reading in Halifax at "Word on the Street" at the same time I was, so I went up to him and told him that story, because I wanted him to know that his being there had been really important for me.

QJR: The tour must be a great chance to meet other writers.

MC: Writing's a really solitary process, and a really private one, and sometimes it can feel like you're the only one out there doing it, so it was really nice to get out there and actually meet other people who are doing it. I still don't know if I feel like I'm a part of a writer's community, or fraternity, or any thing like that.

QJR: What sort of opportunity for community is there for you in Kingston?

MC: Kingston is the one place where I do feel part of a community, because there is one. People are really supportive of one another. It's a small town, so a lot of the same people end up coming out to the events. I really like that about Kingston. But in terms of a Canadian writing scene, I still feel like a bit of a fake, or a pretender; like someone's going to ask for the membership card one of these days and I'm not going to have it.

QJR: You're wearing the black lipstick.

MC: Yeah. But I think that's probably more in the past. It's the public side — interviews or doing readings or having people review my books — where it still feels like I'm fooling people. With the writing, I don't feel like that at all. I take the writing really seriously. It's what I want to do with my life. I hope I'm going to write until I die. So for me not to feel like a pretender, I'd have to take the public side more seriously. But I don't know.

Maybe it's good to have a healthy skepticism about that whole side of things. It just seems so pretentious in some people. So maybe it's good to feel like a pretender when you're doing all this public stuff. It's good to feel, "This isn't quite real. This isn't the important part of being a writer!

QJR: How would you measure your success so far?

MC: At this point, it's really hard to get an ego about being a writer, because there's always a reading like the one in Calgary that tells you that you're still pretty much at the bottom of the ladder. If it were five years ago and I were looking ahead to where I am now, I'd be thinking, "Yeah, that would be amazing. That would be a huge success for me." But I'm still completely unknown. I have a small audience. Hard Light came out in June and it's sold about 1,000 copies since then, which for a book of poetry in Canada is incredible, but your average garage band could press their own CD and sell twice that number. It's easy to keep your perspective as a writer.

the QJR literary challenge no. 2

Two questions this month:

1. I was born and raised in the same Chicago suburb as Frank Lloyd Wright. I wrote extensively for The Toronto Daily Star and Esquire during the early segment of my career and was responsible for smuggling many copies of James Joyce's Ulysses into the United States from my home in Toronto. Long standing rumours of my losing a bout with Morley Callaghan have never been substantiated. Who am I?

2. While I am considered one of the most influential authors of the late 20th Century, surprisingly little is known about me. I began publishing stories in small magazines during the 1950s; my first novel won the highly-coveted William Faulkner First Novel Award. I received the National Book Award for the only novel I published during the 1970s. Rumoured to be highly eccentric and certainly very reclusive, many critics postulate that I am, in fact, only a pseudonym for another famous recluse, J.D. Salinger. Who am I?

There will be two winners this month, one for each question.
The same person may respond to both questions.

Please forward all responses to:
QJR Literary Challenge
272 Earl Street
journal@post.queensu.ca

All responses must be received by Friday, January 15th at 5:00 p.m. At this time, two correct responses will be chosen (at random, if necessary) and be awarded one gift certificate each in the amount of $10 from Wayfarer Books. In the event of one correct response, a single $20 certificate will be issued; if no correct answers are submitted, the prizes will carry over into the next challenge. This month's Challenge is authored by the editor of The Queen's Journal Reader.

Congratulations to Last Month's Winners: Michael Keast and Sarah Riegel. Each will receive a $10 Gift Certificate from Wayfarer Books.

Get a job!

The Alma Mater Society of Queen's University fills hundreds of paid positions every year. All members of the Alma Mater Society are eligible to apply. Students must maintain their membership throughout their term of employment.

It's time to start thinking about getting a job!

Positions available before the end of the Winter term will include all of AMS Council, all managers, assistant managers, and staff at the UBS Exchange, the Walkhome Service, the P&CC, Alfie's Pub, the Queen's Journal, the Tricolour Yearbook, Studio Q, the AMS Foodbank Student Constables, Hoods & Gowns, the QEA, Extended Child Care, and the Queen's Pub.

The AMS is committed to employment equity. Positions are open to all AMS members in good academic standing in ASUS, COMM, CON-ED, ED, ENG, MBA, MEDS, NURSING, PHYS-ED, and REHAB.

Manager & Assistants

WWW Publications needs a Manager and two Assistants (Design & Sales) to sell and produce next year's What's Next and Who's Where, starting February 1, 1999.

The AMS General Office is looking for an experienced computer support person to oversee the office's network, hardware and software, including user support, starting February 1, 1999.

Computer support

Applications will available at the AMS in the lower JDUC, and will be due back in the new year.

IGNORANCE IS BLISS
Some things you probably didn't want to know:

COMPILED BY LAURA MACINNIS AND J.C. BELLINGER

30% of Americans do not wash their hands after using a public washroom, although 9 out of 10 claim that they do.
We inhale between 10,000 and 20,000 litres of air a day, which contain between 10,000 and one million microorganisms.
Some bacteria can survive for months on a single dust particle.
65 per cent of American adolescents get acne. Not getting it then does not mean that one will not get it as an adult.
Catheters are prime sites for infection.
70 per cent of people with colds have infectious material on their hands.
A fine black line on the gums is a serious indication of chronic lead poisoning.
Spongy gums can be a sign of chronic mercury poisoning.
300,000 injuries — including 80,000 deaths — occur each year in hospitals due to negligence.
It is possible to get crabs from a toilet seat, as well as from a sauna.
Obstetricians and gynecologists have one of the highest rates of being sued for malpractice.
There are 120 viruses, including Hepatitis A, that live in feces. When the toilet is flushed, water droplets containing more than 25,000 virus particles and 600,000 bacteria fly from the bowl, hover for a few hours, eventually landing on surfaces as much as six feet away. And don't think that closing the lid will help. The bacterial cloud will be released as soon as you open it. Toothbrushes are a common destination for this vapour. Furthermore, cleaning your toilet with disinfectant, even regularly, will not rid your toilet of this bacteria. You'll need a professional laboratory for that.
Perhaps, since this is being printed in a newspaper, this information will be disregarded. However, just for the record, a "new" newspaper is germ-free, as fresh ink inhibits the growth of bacteria. A newspaper several days old, on the other hand, could be covered with potentially dangerous germs.
Living with dust mites is inevitable. They make their homes in beds, floors, overstuffed couches, chairs and stuffed animals, among other locales.
Clothing is also a favourable spot. A double bed may harbour up to 2 million dust mites, which excrete 10 to 20 times daily.
Kissing a sick person is safer than shaking their hand. Most germs are distributed via hands, then from hands to mouths, noses and eyes.
People who do not drink, do not smoke, do not engage in sex, do not consume more than 25 grams of saturated fat per day, and who do not exercise aerobically at least five times a week do not necessarily live longer. It only seems that way.

The Long Shadow of St. Pierre

BY ELI SCHUSTER

Trudeau's Shadow
By Andrew Cohen & J. L. Granatstein

As most of you who read my last opinion-editorial in The Queen's Journal can probably guess, I'm not a big fan of former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau. Leaving aside his revolting embrace of Cuban dictator Fidel Castro, and the questions of whether or not the traditional Liberal Party principles of Official Bilingualism have created more problems than they were designed to solve, and just how much credit Trudeau deserves for keeping Canada together (the separatist movement has never faced a stronger challenger than Trudeau, yet he clearly also damaged national unity both by ratifying the Constitution without Quebec's signature, and picking on Alberta through the National Energy Program), the most destructive legacy of the Trudeau years would have to be the mountain of debt he left behind.

It's hard not to admire a politician who, on one occasion paused in the middle of a dull speech he was required to deliver on a dull subject, and said: "my speech writer goes on to say..."

Trudeau claimed in a 1975 CTV interview that: "(t)he government is going to have to take a large role in running institutions... It means there is going to be not less authority in our lives, but perhaps more." Not surprisingly, he oversaw a nine-fold increase in federal spending between 1968 and 1984, while net federal debt jumped from $18 billion (26 percent of GDP) to $206 billion (46 percent). While it is true that the federal Tories ran the debt up to more than $500 billion, Andrew Coyne writes that "(e)very dollar of the $300 billion added to the debt during the Tory years was interest on the debt the Liberals had left behind". This should be of interest to the average Queen's student because it will be our generation that's going to get stuck with the bills for Trudeau's and Mulroney's fiscal recklessness.

With all of this in mind, I recently read through a collection of essays edited by Andrew Cohen and J.L. Granatstein called Trudeau's Shadow, and came away impressed; not with Trudeau's term as Prime Minister, which I think was largely a disaster for the country, but with his personal deportment. Yes, he was arrogant, but in a likeable, "evil wrestler" sort of way.

In his essay "Hedgehog or Fox?", Bob Rae points out that Trudeau's enemies often attempted to dismiss him as "nothing but a conservative", or "nothing but a socialist", or "nothing but a sellout", without any real understanding of the man they attacked. Trudeau liked to quote the famous aphorism that "the style is the man himself", which leads Rae to argue that "(n)o assessment of Trudeau that tries to pigeon-hole him... is worth very much if it is based on some ideological standard". Trudeau's Shadow, I believe, offers some fascinating insights into the very complex character of our former Prime Minister.

From Trudeau's former personal secretary, Jim Coutts, we discover a brilliant man of the world who had "read and absorbed" large parts of the Encyclopedia Britannica, couldn't tell a joke to save his life, and yet enjoyed the skillful use of both official languages so much that he spent hours drafting, and re-drafting form letters "because he felt that the substance was inadequate or that a limp phrase had been used - not one that he would ever use". It's hard not to admire a politician who, on one occasion paused in the middle of a dull speech he was required to deliver on a dull subject, and said: "my speech writer goes on to say..."

For those who find themselves enamoured of Trudeau's intellectual abilities, or see him as some kind of personal guru, I would heartily recommend Rae's contribution, which rightfully takes the former Prime Minister to task for the demagogic side of his personality. Trudeau had to win every argument, and there was an "undergraduate quality that marked his diatribes at their worst: personal, unfair, never allowing for a moment the possibility that someone of integrity might take a different view." — Bob Rae

The book's greatest flaw is its lack of balance. Most of the essays are extremely sympathetic to Trudeau, and no one really brings the hammer down on him. The only conservative contributors are Coyne and Michael Bliss, although neither of them are all particularly ideological; the book screams out for something by William Gairdner or David Frum which goes beyond Trudeau's economic record, yet nothing like that is delivered. On the other side, The Globe and Mail's far-left columnist Rick Salutin, and the National Post's (Conrad, what were you thinking...?) Linda McQuaig attack Trudeau over tax fairness, culture, and his use of the War Measures Act.

As well, some of the contributions simply are not very helpful in understanding Trudeau. Robert Mason Lee's essay tells us more about Mr. Lee's childhood than about why the West never warmed to Trudeau. Similarly, Mark Kingwell's essay is a weird and confusing series of stream-of-consciousness flashbacks.

In spite of these flaws, Trudeau's Shadow is an interesting look at a fascinating character. It's not worth the $35 retail price, but Stauffer Library should have it pretty soon.

from The Vinyl Café.

"The deadline," McLean answers at once when asked about where his motivation to write comes from. "I have a job to do... I wouldn't be staying up late writing these stories unless it was my job," he said. "It would be nice to go for a walk, see some friends, or see a movie or something, but I feel I have to write, I have to get the thing done."

When he gets writer's block, McLean manipulates the details of everyday life to create a good story.

"Mostly it begins with one little idea from something... one tiny idea and then you built everything around that," he said. "The details of Dave's life are not the details of my life. Most of those things have never happened to me. But I think there's a fair bit of me there, but he is not me. He's his own little guy."

McLean has truly sunk his teeth into the Canadian arts. He is host of The Vinyl Café, he has authored four books, and teaches broadcast journalism at Ryerson Polytechnic University. McLean said the biggest challenge for Canadian writers is to make a living from the industry, because the market is small. "Not many writers make a living in Canada as a writer," he said. "You have to balance your writing with something else. You have to have a radio show, or you have to be teaching, both things which I do."

The CBC is more than a radio station for McLean. He says the CBC plays an integral role in Canadian society, building and maintaining a sense of community across the country. "It's a place where we can come together... it's a coffee shop. It's a big national coffee shop where you can go, and you can hear the music that people are playing in bars and cities across the country and in coffee houses and pubs, and where we can learn about the literature that's being created, the plays and the art that's being made, and the business that's being done, and to hear what people are talking about across the country. It's to help me know my country," he said.

The nation-building role of the CBC is key to McLean's understanding of our country's future. "If we are going to be together and stay together it's important that we know each other's stories. That we can understand each other. It's that may or may not pay out. They foster understanding and acceptance so that we can stay together, and want to stay together," he said. "We have a proud history and a way of doing things which is different from anyone else, that has to be preserved and we could take a chance on pursuing stories that were not guaranteed stories. They can't afford to do that anymore, because they are cut so close to the bone that if every producer doesn't produce a story a day, or a week, or whatever it is, they won't get on the air. So when it comes time for assigning stories they're cautious, and they only assign stories that they know are going to succeed, which are the safe, uninteresting stories. That's what comes from cutbacks. You won't get those wonderful, magic moments."

McLean speaks with reservation about finding the way out of this trouble. "The only solution that I can see is not a good solution, which is to cut back on local programming, and bring that money to the network. But I think part of CBC's strength is its local programming. I don't know if you want to do that. The other solution is to increase funding again... But luckily I don't have to make these decisions. I'm just a guy with a radio show."

And so McLean will continue, stitching our country together, one story at a time.

Gowdy's White magic

"Very," comes the immediate reply. "Some reviewers have accused me of anthropomorphizing," she says, referring to the Toronto Sun newspaper, renowned for its edifying literary standards and keen critical insights. "I'm surprised they spelled the word right." While seeking to map "the elephant reality" is, in the author's words, "a presumptuous and flawed enterprise from the beginning," the effort is genuine. Still - I persist, hoping not to seem like I'm persisting - we can read instances in the novel of ironic reversals of human attitudes: the pachyderm wisdom, "Risk nothing, forfeit nothing," for example, does have the sound of tables being turned; but Gowdy is ready for such an argument. "There are those odd coincidences where we find in another society or another culture something that seems to show an awareness of ours." She points out that if elephants could read the stories of humans, they might feel the same sense of déjà vu, or of having been themselves imitated.

Trying "to grasp the herd mentality" was not easy for a self-confessed "anti-social" being. When I inquire about the importance the idea of community has, both in this novel and in much of her other work (the Canary family, not only Joan, is the focus in Myster Sandman, and in The White Bone, the character Tall Time wonders whether beings who "hear themselves being called L... may form the impression that beyond their own skin the worth of the world dwindles"), Gowdy is reluctant to see much importance at all. "I'm allergic to my own family," she says; but then wonders whether "getting older" isn't softening her view. While she does note that her "Canaries hang out with Canaries, elephants with elephants," she is interested in exploring different avenues of social association. Homosexuality, which appears prominently in her previous novel, is another characteristic Gowdy refuses to leave as exclusively human terrain. "I sav gerbils at Woolworth's having oral sex," she tells me - a claim, I think, capable of flummoxing any interviewer - and goes on to point out that there are "hints" of homoeroticism in the new novel.

The white bone of the novel's title is a central component in the complex mythology Gowdy creates for her characters: the bone (respectfully called the "that-way bone") is a holy relic which will lead the elephants to "The Safe Place", the haven they seek from butchery. Asked where the idea of this particular symbol came from, Gowdy notes that holy objects in religion are "usually something small and white or pale," and that factually, the old bones of the elephants do bleach. "I needed something that would point them." That the bone is an infant's bone leads me to ask about the notion of innocence in her work. Many of the central characters in Gowdy's fictions tend to exemplify a weird sort of innocence, and their eccentricities (ranging from not speaking and hanging out in closets to having sex with cadavers) are fathomable and sympathetic for the purity of their motives. In The White Bone, Mud, the female (cow) protagonist of the story, is continually called "Mud" rather than "She-Spurns", the adult form of address applied to the other cows (some of which have great names: "She-Screams", "She-Deflates"; "She-Moans-and-Moans"). Why is innocence so important to Barbara Gowdy? "Maybe it's just because I'm a middle-aged woman who's never had children," comes the concession, in which I can hear the tongue crowding her cheek. More seriously, she offers the view that animals and children are to be cherished for being free of the "double-dealing and vengeance-mongering" of human beings.

For a human, then, Barbara Gowdy is a gracious and thoughtful animal, whose fiction can sometimes reveal a "third eye" (visionary ability). You can catch her reading with Diane Schomperlen at the Edward Day Gallery on Tuesday, December 8 at 8 pm.

And that's a good thing.
QJR: So things are tough on the Canadian literary scene?
MC: Well, the fact that Hard Light has sold that many copies is also a really exciting thing. I think even five or ten years ago, a book of poetry that sold 250 or 300 copies was considered a bestseller in Canada. Now, hundreds of people are out there buying this book. Most of whom are not my family! It's amazing to me that total strangers are shelling out hard-earned bucks to read this book. It's possible now to be a Canadian writer and write a novel and actually make some money from it. Canadian fiction is hot right now. Hot hot hot.

QJR: I'm sensing that this new book set in Newfoundland might be a novel.

MC: [laughing] It might be. That's what I'd like to try next. There's that progression, which gives the false impression that you're moving from a smaller thing to a bigger or more important thing. I don't feel that way, but a novel has always felt like a huge undertaking to me. I never had an idea that I thought could be big enough to be a novel. And I've never felt like I was a good-enough writer to take on a project that big. I didn't want to write two bad novels to get to a good one, or have every third chapter be a good one. I didn't want to try to write one until I was ready. I hope I'm ready. I'm not sure yet. I think you don't know until you start.

Informative Receipt Depicting The Failed Attempt to Invoke Billie Holiday in Autumn

SHORT FICTION BY RYAN BOGGS

"If we shared their utter ignorance of the desired reputable defeat, you and I would be ducking the hypnotist's yielding hibernation, we share winter's confident wail through our vague mirrors, and by that I mean windows, suggesting our perspective in this clear, clear black pin cushion — hanging above our reclined judgement, believe me I truly appreciate matches. let me ask you, would you pretend to be hung to make me laugh? would you appreciate accidentally? do shivers in your muscles warm the rest of your body so comfortably that you are slightly disappointed when they recede to the back of your thighs? turn around — run vines behind you across the pools of bruises covisioning gathered, crapulous mystics licking a reminder of bone, bathing now in the marsh with a smashed moon — with the moon hanging above her reclined judgement. I'm not talking about pennies from heaven here, nah, nah these are northern ontarian trantas performed for blissfully, humbly, amputated trunks and contoured roots. then in the summer we will tend to the fruitbelt's family farm boneyards, anyways ah, her stars — secret blurred tears of light scratching a blood potential ambling in high celibaey, autumn's harvest and autumn's wine — a song for sleepy spare change diving off the balcony into a spotlight for the spontaneous horror hip swayed into velvet, so, in the winter do you sit in the shower waiting for the cue of a spider?"

she smiled, i scratched my head, not entirely aware of the theatrics of my gesture, we both drank our coffees in one gulp, i started gnawing on my thumb and i let her have my last cigarette.

she lowered her eyelids, pursed her lips so that the upper left side was smirking and said, "nice try, here's some money for long johns."

"but what about the myth of my missing nipple..."

i had begun to whine and stutter, she got up, put her scarf on and turned her back to me as she flipped the end of the scarf over her shoulder, she started singing, "Who Do You Think is Coming to Town, You'll Never guess Who..."

(still whining but no longer stuttering) "...returned to shape under a room cleaning vacuum?" i got up, put my checkered hunting hat with ear flaps on, held the door for a farting white horse and then followed her down the street, she stopped singing and with a voice that did not resign to the wind, she assertively stated, without turning around, that "it's too fucking cold, besides you smell like you clean a horse's ass with latex gloves and that new kind of irish spring, but what i WILL do is let you watch my ass get smaller."

i stopped to watch, i didn't know what to say, i was shocked, then i called out to her "Oh Yeah, Wheel Jeem Stall Goying Owoot Az Dock Boggs Fer Owloween Wether Yer Wit Me or Knot, Preecky Polly Preeetee Polly yer guesstini' a-bout Right, Pretty Polly Pret-tah Polly yer guesstini' a-bout Right, I Dug On Yer Grave Two-Thirds of Last Ni-ite" she pivoted on her left and curved her hips — a wink received and a blown kiss intercepted by a yellow and red leaf that promptly proceeded across the street, to my right, to gently wipe a droplet off the tip of the frozen, erect penis of Rogue, Wally's dog. The leaf fell with the sudden weight — I looked up and saw Wally, who i hadn't seen in a month, standing across the street waving.

"...some way, we both have a lifetime before us for parting..."

DID YOU KNOW that there are just 397 days left until the year 2000? That's just 9,528 hours, as I write this. Or 571,705 minutes. Really, it's less than you think. With all the hype surrounding the once-in-a-millennium event, one would expect to be a bit more informed about what is actually going to transpire on Thursday, December 31, 1999 at 11:59 pm. Despite what you have heard, Y2K problem notwithstanding, you would be best advised to follow the best general advice that anyone can give you: don't believe the hype and lower your expectations. It's the only way to be happy. Some information on all things millennial:

Prophets, the Good

REMARKABLY, not all millennial prognosticators have been off the mark. A few truly wise men: John Elfreth Watkins, Jr., writing in 1900, made many predictions regarding the coming century that have proven stunningly accurate. Among them (and remember, Watkins is writing in 1900 — there no airplanes, much of the world had yet to industrialize, primitive automobiles had only just been invented, and the telephone was still an eccentric novelty):

- "Hot and cold air from spigots... Rising early to build the furnace fire will be a task of the olden times. Homes will have no chimneys, because no smoke will be created within their walls."
- "Photographs will be telegraphed from any distance. If there be a battle in China... snapshots of its most striking events will be published in the newspapers an hour later."
- "Telephones around the world. Wireless telephone circuits will span the world. A husband in the middle of the Atlantic will be able to converse with his wife in Chicago... they will connect any circuit without the intervention of a 'hello girl.'"
- "Oranges... in Philadelphia. Fast-flying refrigerators on land and sea will bring delicious fruits from the tropics within a few days... Scientists will have discovered how to raise here many fruits now confined to much hotter or colder climates."

As impressive as Watkins may have been, he is upstaged by David Goodman Croly, known also as "Sir Oracle." Some excerpts from his book, published 12 years previous to Watkins' predictions, in 1888:

- Contemporary Telecommunications: "In the year 2000, it will not be necessary to go to a meeting to hear a political orator, or to a concert hall to hear the noblest instrumental or vocal music. The telephone and graphophone [sic] will be so perfected that we can enjoy these pleasures in our own homes."
- The Environmental Movement: "No one should be allowed to cut down a tree without planting another in its place."
- No-Fault Divorce: "Marriage is no longer a religious rite even in Catholic countries, but a civil contract, and the logical result would seem to be a state of public opinion which would justify a change of partners whenever the contracting couple mutually agreed to separate."
- Remote Sensing technology, the invention and advent of air transportation: "Aerial navigation will solve the mystery of the poles, and there will be no 'dark region' of any of the continents... [humanity will] become migratory, like the birds, occupying the more mountainous regions and seacoasts in summer and more tropical climes in winter."
- Corporate Mergers: "The larger commercial movements in all civilized countries are tending to mass wealth in few hands and to decrease the numbers and influence of the middle class... [these changes] have driven out the small storekeeper, because they can give a

Prophets, The Bad

THE END OF THE MILLENIUM has produced its share of doomsday prophets as well. Some dire predictions:

- Nostradamus's Apocalypse: Nostradamus predicts that the world as we know it will meet its end in July of 1999, prophesizing that "in the year 1999 and seven months will come a great king of terror from the skies..." Some have interpreted the seer's words to signal an impending nuclear missile strike.
- Mother Shipton: a historic figure in northern England, Mother Shipton made predictions during her lifetime that are, reputedly, "as famous as Nostradamus." A reclusive 16th Century witch, Mother Shipton was allegedly "impregnated by a being of awesome, superhuman origin, who rewarded her sexual generosity by giving her powers similar to his own." She has been credited with successfully predicting the defeat of the Spanish Armada and World War II, among many others. Concerning the year 2000, Mother Shipton predicts that "An Eagle [the U.S.] shall destroy castles of the Thames, and there shall be crowned the Son of Man, and the fourth year shall be many battles for the faith and the Son of Man, with the Eagles shall be preferred, and there shall be peace over the world... and then shall he go to the land of the Cross. The contemporary interpretation of Mother Shipton's predictions runs has the U.S. defeating an Arabic country in a religious war that lasts four years. Following that, writes Mother Shipton, the world will end.

- George Washington. Yes, George Washington — the Commander-in-Chief of the Colonial Army during the Revolutionary War and first president of the United States of America — is also a doomsday prophet. According to legend, one day during the Revolutionary War, a woman appeared to him and said: "Son of the Republic, look and learn." Then a vision of the world in 1999 appeared to him: a dark angel cast a black cloud over America, lightning flashed and people screamed in agony. A dark cloud came from the east and covered America "with its ill omen." Black clouds soon clouded other countries, each bearing a steady red light at its centre. Through the darkness Washington could discern huge armies gathering, which then sailed across the ocean and "overwhelmed America." A huge battle ensued; then the angel sprinkled water over the world and there was peace. Apparently, contemporary revelations aside, the Oval Office has always been a happening place to be.

Prophets, the Ugly

SOME PREDICTIONS are just plain wrong, even when they are still just predictions. Some of the most excruciatingly-embarrassing prognosticators:

- Arthur C. Clarke: known as a prolific and seminal science fiction author and widely-respected as a scientist (he is credited as being the first scientist to propose the concept of a satellite in geosynchronous orbit), Clarke had a notable miss in 1966, when he wrote: "[using] wonderful new materials...houses [in 2000] will be able to fly...whole communities may migrate south in the winter or move whenever they feel the need for a change of scenery."
- Popular Mechanics: also more commonly known for its "realistic" science, the popular magazine predicted in 1950 that "housewives [sic] in 50 years may wash dirty dishes right down the drain...[the plastic dishes] will melt in hot water."
- Larry Le Gaspi: in 1981, fashion designer Le Gaspi predicted that by 2000 our clothes would be solar-powered, envisioning "solar power packs" that "draw energy from the sun and store it." Tubes distribute the warmth (in the winter) and cold (in the summer) around the body. Designer Louis Feraud, also in 1981, had similar delusions of grandeur, writing: "in the year 2001, a person will be able to change the colour of his [sic] skin at will."

- The Uranus Society: Never known to be vague, the Uranus Society offers the following highly-detailed account of the events that will signal the dawning of the new millennium: "Telepathic messages will be received by Southern California UFO 'disciples,' a 'Pleiadian starship' will land on a rising portion of Atlantis in the Bermuda Triangle...in the year 2001! At this point, the Earth will join a confederation of '33 planets,' forming 'an Interplanetary Confederation for the Spiritual Renaissance of Humankind on Earth.' For the record, the Uranus Society's first such prediction, which called for the aliens to arrive in 1985, passed without incident. But then again, it is 2000 this time..."

Millennial Merchandising

Some prophets attempting to turn profits:

- The Millennium: a polished, stainless steel casket. But how is it "millennial?" "It has a contemporary look and innovative design."
- Toothbrush for the Millennium: a toothbrush with twin heads that provides "greater stimulation of the gums." Again, what's so 2K about that? "It heralds a new age in what a toothbrush can do." Apparently a "toothbrush" is no longer simply a "toothbrush." It is now a "gum and tooth brush." My prediction: we will all have cleaner gums in the coming decade.
- The Millennium: a semiautomatic nine-millimetre handgun. How is it millennial? "It's futuristic," say its makers at Taurus International Manufacturing. That, I suppose, and it's a violent weapon. See the connection? Of course. It was obvious.

A Party Like It's 1999

SOME OF THE WORLD'S most extravagant parties will be taking place on December 31st, 1999. Among them:

- The Panama Canal. While a 51-mile canal in Central America may not seem like a logical choice for a New Millennium's Eve bash, Panamanians are very excited over the prospect of observing the moment when control of the canal reverts to them — on January 1st, 2000. Celebration plans began in 1977 for the event.
- Armageddon. Yes, it is an actual location (in Israel). According to the Book of Revelation, Armageddon will be the site of the final battle that will end time, whenever that is.
- The Statue of Liberty in New York City. While no details have been disclosed as yet, the event is reportedly entitled: "Liberty Island: Celebration of a Lifetime." All other details are being withheld until such time as they are finalized.
- Party 2000 in Southern California. Party 2000, a three day event to begin on December 30, 1999, expects an attendance of 2.5 million people from around the world.

Miscellaneous Millenia

- The first hotel reservation for December 31, 1999 was made in 1957, at New York's Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.
- Dick Clark, who will be hosting ABC's "New Year's Rockin' Eve" from Times Square on December 31, 1999, will be 70 at the time of the event.
- Mark David Chapman — that's the person who murdered John Lennon — will be eligible for parole on December 4, 2000.
- 20th Century Fox has decided that in the 21st Century, its name will be simply "Fox." But, just in case, they have trademarked "21st Century Fox" as well.
- According to the Hebrew calendar, "2000" is "5760." By the Chinese calendar, 2000 is 4698 and according to the Indian calendar, 2000 is just boring old 1921.

Idiomatic

a selection of common phrases and their uncommon origins

to heckle someone

MEANING: to disturb or jeer a speaker
 FROM: in medieval Europe, a brush with iron teeth, or "heckle," was employed in the process of clothesmaking. By the 15th Century, "heckle" had been transformed into a verb meaning "to scratch with a steel brush" and from there "to look for weaknesses."

what a sucker:

MEANING: a pushover, naive
 FROM: European settlers newly arrived in the New World found a fish that fed on the bottom of rivers and streams, what they named a "sucker." Soon, any fish that remotely resembled one was informally known as a sucker; such that it seemed that any time anyone threw a hook in the water they produced a sucker. Eventually, the term arrived at its present meaning: someone who will fall for anything — as in being easy to catch and rather worthless.

cold turkey

MEANING: to quit or stop a certain activity abruptly;
 FROM: Usually only used in the context of drug and/or alcohol abuse.
 Some American scholars link the phrase to the kind of unprepared meal that is based on leftovers from a feast; like a cold turkey cure, it involves little or no preparation. A far more elaborate theory links the appearance of an addict's skin throughout withdrawal with the flesh of a cold, plucked turkey.

face the music

MEANING: to recognize the consequences for an action, to take blame or accept the possibility thereof.
 FROM: No one is sure what the "music" refers to in this phrase, which was first recorded in American sources in the mid-19th Century. One suggestion is that it alludes to a performer going on stage to face the pit-orchestra and the audience. Another theory makes it the bugle call to which a soldier responds. In neither of these explanations, however, is someone showing a willingness to admit publically to an offence. It is more likely that the "music" in this instance is used ironically — the person in question is going to be subjected to "loud and angry condemnation." Someone will make a "song and dance" about what has happened, and that is the "music" that has to be faced.

for pete's sake

MEANING: the equivalent of "for God's sake," or "for Christ's sake," among others.
 FROM: While various religious scholars speculate that "Pete" is Saint Peter, saints are generally not referred to in diminutive forms of their names. It is uncertain that "Pete" represents an actual person at all. "For pity's sake" was a common expression at one time, and "for Pete's sake" may be a deliberate or accidental evolution of that expression.

Med students may leave AMS

By FIONA SCANNELL

At the November 26 meeting of the AMS Assembly, representatives from the Aesculapian Society, representing Queen's medical students, announced plans to hold a referendum regarding their continued affiliation with the Alma Mater Society.

The Aesculapian Society brings Queen's medical students' concerns to the medical faculty, the university, national medical societies and the government.

The question of affiliation with the AMS has been an ongoing area of concern for Aesculapian Society executives. According to Mita Backo, Aesculapian Society president, as the university environment changes, student government must also evolve. Aesculapian Society executives feel the demographics of the medical school population differ significantly enough from those of the undergraduate population to require a distinct representative body, said Backo, Meds '00.

Medical students are usually working on at least their second degree, Backo explained, and many are married and have children. A variety of issues separate medical students from undergraduates, she said, and having a separate student government could better represent their "different interests." The Aesculapian Society executive is holding a referendum because members want the medical students to decide for themselves what should be done.

Kim Meathrel, Meds '00 and Ian Billingsley, Meds '00, Aesculapian representatives to the AMS, said the society is ## Orientation Week on Rosh Hashanah?

By JOCELYN LAPORTE

Orientation Week '99 may require rescheduling as, next year, the final two days of Orientation Week fall on Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish new year. Rosh Hashanah, which occurs from sundown Friday until Sunday, is one of the most sacred events in the Judaistic calendar. It falls at this time only once every five to seven years.

Rosh Hashanah is regarded as a time to spend with family and at synagogue. Jewish students would be unable to properly participate both in Rosh Hashanah and Orientation Week. All orientation groups, residence services and the Dean of Student Affairs Bob Crawford will meet this week to determine a resolution to this issue.

The committees involved with the organization of Orientation Week have debated many possible solutions. Events scheduled for Friday and Saturday could be eliminated, the week could be rescheduled so that events of lesser importance fall on those days, the events could be moved a week ahead, the

Proposed tuition fee upsets med residents

By SHAWN BRIMLEY

Queen's administration is planning to charge a $2,000 tuition fee to medical residents commencing studies next July.

Dr. Satita Verma, associate dean of post-graduate medical education, explained that "residents are students of the university as well as hospital employees."

"We are not students," countered Dr. Julian Harriss, speaking for the Queen's residents committee on funding and tuition. "If I was a student, I would expect to attend class, have a teaching list and take exams... we've already got our degree, we are practicing physicians."

The Resident Committee on Funding and Tuition, together with the Professional Association of Interns and Residents of Ontario, submitted a petition to the Queen's University Senate last Thursday, on which more than 300 students and staff stated their opposition to the fee and pledged to withhold Alumni donations to the university if a tuition fee was implemented.

Barry Smith, dean and vice-principal of the Faculty of Health Sciences, said in a fax that the tuition fee is based on 50 per cent of the Arts and Science tuition figure. When implemented to all post-graduate medical years, revenue from the tuition fees will generate about $450,000 in income for the university.

"A lot more than $450,000 per year could be raised from alumni contributions," countered Harriss.

"The $2,000 they have levied as a possible fee makes no sense to me," said Ratan Bhardwaj, a third-year medical student and Health Sciences senator. "I fail to see the logic in charging half the Arts and Science tuition."

"If tuition fees were to be established, then I would hope and expect that most, if not all of the revenue would be put towards enhancing the learning environment for the residents," said Verma. "If the program does not benefit from the tuition fees, than charging students would be difficult to justify."

Under the Ontario governments detelegation guidelines, 30 per cent,

Rookie nights debated

By ADAM KAMINSKY

How far is too far? In light of recent 'tookie night' incidents involving intoxication, at Queen's and at other universities, the Inter-university Athletic Commission, a committee that includes current varsity athletes, alumni and administration, called a 'captains meeting' to answer this and other questions.

The meeting, which involved a captain and a returning player from every varsity team, was brought on by problems that occurred with five separate rookie celebrations earlier in the term. The teams were track and field, swimming, men's water polo, men's soccer and women's rugby.

"Each of these five teams met with myself, their coaches and Janean Sergeant, to deal with the situation," said director of athletics and recreation John McFarlane. "The IAC

Details of smoking ban still unclear

BY LINDSAY BLAKELY

Since last April, Queen's administration has planned to implement a smoking ban in residences that would start next September, however, as the semester comes to an end, the administration has still not decided on an acceptable and cost-efficient alternative arrangement for smokers.

Residences will only go non-smoking "provided suitable arrangements [can] be made for smokers," said Graham Brown, director of residences.

Approximately 10 years ago smoking was banned from main residence common rooms, following an earlier smoking ban on floor common rooms.

In the 1997-98 Annual Report of the Ban Right Board issued by Dean of Student Affairs Bob Crawford, there was a section concerning smoking policy. The section was written last year, after a committee thoroughly examined the issue of prohibiting smoking in residences, as had been done in all other Queen's buildings.

The report stated that, "after careful study and consultation, the Board supported the principle of a total ban on smoking in Queen's residences during the student year." The report also highlighted, based on experience at other universities, the importance of providing designated smoking areas for smokers prior to the implementation of the ban.

"We want to have non-smoking residences, but [first] you need to figure out how and where students who do smoke can do it," said Crawford. He noted that this issue has raised many problems as a variety of factors need to be taken into account before the ban can be effectively implemented.

Brown said the issue needs to be considered in light of a broader space review program and a broader budgeting plan. Brown said the two solutions intended to offer suitable provisions for smokers each entail their own set of concerns. Both options are expensive and "require further planning and thinking," he continued.

One option is to put an internal

Queen's compared to Ivy League

BY LIANNE ELLIOTT

An article appearing in US News and World Report raised some debate during the open question period of the November 26 Queen's Senate meeting.

Senator and Professor of Economics R.M. McInnis questioned the article's claim that Queen's and other Canadian schools are "bargain price alternatives" available to American students seeking a high quality post-secondary education. Contrary to the article's suggestions, he believes Queen's to be only a "pale imitation of the American private university."

The article, entitled "The Bargains North of the Border," was part of America's Best Colleges, the annual August issue of US News and World Report equivalent to the Maclean's Canadian University Guide. It linked the low Canadian dollar and Canadian government education subsidies as two key reasons for the American economic benefit of studying in Canada. Even at Canada's most expensive universities, the University of Guelph and the University of Toronto, the article states that Americans only pay $7,000 (US) per year.

The article also insists that "cheap does not translate to second rate," linking schools such as Queen's University and the University of Toronto to the Ivy League schools of Harvard and Yale.

McInnis's concerns with the article are linked to his criticism of Queen's method of recruiting American and international students. He said he sees the article as a reinforcement of what he feels is Queen's attempt to promote themselves as a Canadian equivalent to an American private college. "Their pitch is that a student looking for an Ivy League school should come [to Queen's], but the truth is, we don't offer what an Ivy League school has," he said.

To advertise as a bargain alternative to a private American school, McInnis said he believes Queen's must focus on the general quality of the university and look towards making changes. "I think we do a good job in comparison to the rest of Canada but you always have to be critical," he said. "We must make improvements before we try to compete with Ivy League schools."

Two areas McInnis cited as needing improvements are large class sizes and poor building facilities, stating that "a student arriving at Queen's and expecting an Ivy League school would be aghast."

Contrary to McInnis's claim, Queen's Manager of Student Recruitment Catherine MacNeill insists Queen's has never promoted itself as a Canadian version of an American private college. "We've never said we were equivalent to an Ivy League school... we only present ourselves as a different alternative," she said.

MacNeill is involved with the Canadian Ivy, a group of three of Canada's universities — McGill, University of Toronto and Queen's — which has been actively recruiting across the border, reaching as far as California, Florida and Texas. According to MacNeill, the group does not promote themselves as Ivy League equivalents but as "prestigious Canadian universities," offering Americans "a good quality education" and the opportunity to study in a "different culture and environment."

Queen's Principal Bill Leggett stressed that it was the article, and not the university, that compared Queen's to an Ivy League school. "The article made the comparison, not us," he said.

Leggett is pleased with the article explaining that one of Queen's greatest challenges has been to "compete with American private universities where the average student income is three to seven times greater."

"We should be flattered to be put in their league," he said.

MacNeill expects the number of American students studying at Queen's to rise, as the Canadian Ivy's extensive American recruitment only got underway two years ago. "This year there's already been an increase in information requests and campus visits from places like Texas, California and Georgia," she said.

First-year enrolment increasing

BY STEPHANIE CARVIN

Statistics indicating levels of enrolment at Queen's, which were presented to Senate last Thursday, showed that total enrolment at Queen's has increased by 315 students this year. Enrolment for 1998 stands at 16,852 compared to the 1997 total of 16,537 students.

"I am very pleased in the sense that the demand for enrolment at Queen's [indicates that people] perceive the quality of education that we offer," said Principal Bill Leggett.

Jo-Anne Bechthold, the university registrar, said she felt enrolment at Queen's was "very strong, very healthy and very good... We are pleased with the enrolment."

The university evaluates enrolment by comparing actual enrolments to projected increases. Last year the Office of the Registrar predicted that enrolment for full-time students in 1998 would be 13,366. The actual number of full-time students, 13,643, surpassed this figure.

"I am very pleased in the sense that the demand for enrolment at Queen's [indicates that people] perceive the quality of education that we offer."

Students light way for children

BY LINDSAY BLAKELY

Two Queen's students have conjured up a way to light up the student housing area while also giving toys to needy children.

Anthony Hammill, Comm '99, and Conor Phillips, ArtsSci '00, have created a contest entitled "Light up the Ghetto '98" to brighten up student homes and raise money for underprivileged children at a time of year associated with good will and cheer.

"We were surprised at how much better our house looked once we started decorating it. We thought how nice the ghetto would look if everyone did the same," Hammill said.

The contest engages Queen's students to decorate the outside of their houses in tune with the holiday season. Each house must pay a minimum fee of $10 in order to register in the contest, with all money raised going to the CKLC Children's Toy Drive.

The contest will be judged on December 11 by Kingston Mayor Gary Bennett, who will award the prize to the winning house that evening. "We just called up the mayor's office and talked to his secretary," said Phillips on how they secured the elusive mayor. "They called back the next day and said it was a fantastic idea."

Bennett said the contest is a "great example of Queen's students taking some pride in their neighbourhoods," and "an example of Queen's students contributing to [the] community."

Hammill and Phillips are striving for "two worthwhile objectives," Bennett added.

Hammill and Phillips hope Queen's students can raise enough money to make a difference for at least 20 to 30 kids this holiday season. The organizers said they believe the giving nature of the Queen's student body and the fact that many student houses have already been decorated means "this goal can be achieved.

"We really enjoyed decorating our house as it has put all of us in the holiday spirit and made us happier. We hope others will follow our lead," Hammill said.

Castle frosh can't date staff, new policy says

BY FIONA STEVENSON

A new official policy at the International Study Centre prohibits personal relationships between staff and first-year students and places limitations on personal relationships involving staff and upper-year students.

"We want to encourage people to meet, but we have to put up little flags of warning," said Sandy Montgomery, operations director at the ISC.

On November 11, a memo was sent to the approximately 60 full and part-time staff at the ISC detailing management's position on personal relationships between employees and the castle's approximately 110 students.

The memo stated that personal relationships with first-year students is strictly forbidden and if such a relationship were struck up it would be deemed gross misconduct and would entail instant dismissal.

According to the policy statement, personal relationships with upper-year students are permitted but must be conducted away from the workplace and must not affect the working performance of any individual. Employees are not permitted to stay overnight in Bader Hall or in the castle with that person.

Greg Lessard, academic director at the ISC, said when the ISC first opened there was no defined policy on relationships between staff and students, although an informal policy was in place. "One of the things we were doing is revising the policy manual here for staff at the ISC [to] make explicit some things that weren't made clear in the past," he said.

"The ISC is different from a typical university environment," said Lessard. "We're still seeing how things work here... We're just trying to be very prudent in setting parameters."

Lessard said restructuring the policy became especially important when the ISC began accepting first-year students last year. "Where we have very young students we have a certain duty of care," he said. Lessard said the distinction between first-year and upper-year students is important because many of the first-year students are 17 or 18, whereas some of the upper-year students are mature students with perhaps more experience with life and personal relationships.

According to Lessard, the policy was based, in part, on Queen's residences, where age-based distinctions in policy are also made.

At Queen's residences, "We have two sets of rules, one for floors seniors and house reps and one for dons," said Associate Director of Residence Life Andrew Highet.

"For dons, it's no sexual or romantic relationships with any first-year students in your area of responsibility at any time," he explained. "For the floor seniors and house reps, the rule is that during orientation week, absolutely no

Student group focuses on local community

By REBECCA STELTER

Queen's Project on International Development, a group traditionally focused on international aid efforts, has decided to help development in the Kingston community this year. The group will be working with the newly established, but as of yet unopened, Kingston Youth Shelter, collecting household items to be used in the shelter this weekend.

"QPID hasn't worked in Kingston before this year," Toole commented, which is why plans for its future involvement with the Kingston Youth Shelter will be played "by ear." Toole said QPID will probably be involved in training programs at the shelter, volunteering, counselling programs, and fund raising and advocacy.

The Kingston Youth Shelter was recently created as a result of a survey of street kids, taken last summer. Many of the street kids surveyed expressed the desire to have a place to go to get off the streets. As shelter materials are to be acquired on a donation basis, without QPID's help, "when the shelter opens, there won't be anything in it," said Aynsley Toole, one of QPID's Kingston Project Managers.

The Kingston Youth Shelter is a very unique project, in that the street kids will be helping to run the shelter. They will sit on the board of directors, organize activities, clean and cook, and participate in programs such as peer counselling at the shelter. "I'm really excited, it sounds like a good project," Toole said.

QPID's "K.Y.S. Your Stuff Goodbye campaign" aims to collect these needed items from students living in the student housing district. "There are a lot of resources in Queen's ghetto houses," Toole said, "and this [service] is hassle free. We will come to the houses in a van, pick up the stuff, and give it to the shelter."

QPID is asking Queen's students to donate "anything they can. Preferably not clothes, but games, beds, couches, linens, anything you can think of that would be needed," Toole said. The Kingston Youth Shelter will contain "beds, a daytime recreation room, a kitchen and bathrooms, so they need furniture for all of these," she added.

"I think that the issue [of Kingston street youth] should touch the lives of Queen's students," Toole said. "I know that every student sees them as they walk down Princess Street. I think it should make us consider this opportunity we are given to be at Queen's and it should make us realize how lucky we are."

The drive to pick up students' household items will be held this weekend, December 5 and 6. All students need to do is call the QPID office at 545-6845, tell the Kingston project managers what they will be donating and the QPID van will arrive at their house this weekend to collect their stuff, Toole said.

Loan deferral possible

$135,000, would be made available for student support, the remaining $220,000 would be made available to the School of Medicine for enhancement of the postgraduate programs.

According to Smith, if residents begin paying tuition, they would qualify for deferral of OSAP loan payments.

"That's a crock, it's fantasy," argued Harriss. "The government has not agreed to do this. In 1996 the government agreed in principal to the idea of charging medical residents tuition, but they most surely did not agree to any sort of payment deferral."

"We have to verify that," said Principal Bill Leggett. "If they are classified as students, residents would be better off because of the tax advantages."

Smith gave the following example to support the tuition fee: A resident with a $25,000 loan in 1997 would be required to pay principal and interest on the loan. At eight per cent the interest would be $2,000. If residents start paying tuition, they will be able to defer payment on the OSAP loan resulting in an annual saving of $2,000. According to Smith, "overall this student would be better off by a net of $514 as a result of paying tuition fees."

Harriss disagreed with Smith's example, saying, "Since deregulation, tuition for medical students has gone through the roof, and OSAP has not been adjusted. Many medical students are now turning to the banks, and [the banks] are quite happy to loan money to medical students."

Harriss used his own financial situation as an example; his total debt after undergraduate and medical school amounted to $70,000. He negotiated with the bank, and transferred his government loans to the bank for a lower interest rate. Harriss indicated that most medical students are following suit, and a change in government repayment policy would not affect the financial situation of residents.

"It's ridiculous, if you could see what a medical resident does... charging a tuition fee would be like rubbing salt in the wound," said Bhardwaj. "In most cases, residents have already had seven years of post-secondary education... In some cases residents are working 100 plus hours per week at what works out to be minimum wage... it's a really brutal lifestyle."

"We teach and work harder for our $34,000 a year than many hospital staff do for $100,000," agreed Harriss.

"I need to stress we are very interested in working constructively with the university, with a spirit of co-operation," said Harriss. "But the relationship with the university would be soured [if tuition fees were imposed], and this issue is already creating much ill-feeling towards the university by graduates of medicine here at Queen's."

"I understand and empathize with these students, but the issue here is the same for all students," stated Leggett. "We have a commitment to sustain the quality of programs here at Queen's... it is becoming increasingly difficult to [sustain quality] in this economic environment."

Leggett added, "The majority of Queen's students understand the importance of the high quality of programs here at Queen's... at what point is it equitable to charge one group and not another?"

Housing: the good, bad and ugly

By MAGGIE BUHAJCZYK

In anticipation of the January house hunt, the Alma Mater Society Municipal Affairs Commission hosted their annual "Housing Horror and Not-so Horror Tour" on Wednesday evening.

According to Sarah Corman, municipal affairs commissioner, the goal of the tour was to present student housing issues to the community and to illustrate the positive results that occur when landlords and tenants care about their homes. "The tour raises awareness about student housing and makes sure our issues stay on top of the city's agenda," she explained.

"We want to show that positive improvements are taking place, but they require a lot of effort from the tenants, landlords and the city," said Liz Smart, chair of the Housing Issues Taskforce and organizer of the event.

Visiting four houses in the student housing area, the tour exemplified both the best and worst of housing conditions.

The examples of poor living conditions ranged from leaking pipes and structural problems to squirrels in the ceiling. "Most of what we want gets done, the problem is quality. Everything is a short fix," said Scott Hicks, Sci '00.

On the other end of the spectrum, landlord Nancy Smith showed that students can have all the amenities of home, including heat insulation and dishwashers.

A new MAC initiative, the Property Standards Taskforce, was also discussed on the tour. Working with the city, the Property Standards Taskforce offers free property standards evaluations to all student tenants.

Smart said a property standards evaluation can identify housing problems and give students a legal recourse. "If students get a notice, they can show it to the landlord and it gets done," she said.

Residents of 269 Frontenac St. said the efforts of the Taskforce helped them solve problems they were experiencing with their landlord. "We now have a civil relationship with our landlord. There's some respect now," said Alex Tarantino, Arts '01.

Linda Chartier, Property Standards Officer for the area, said students should first notify the landlord with any concerns. "If you get no response, call program standards and we'll get an inspection," she said.

Winner of last year's MAC "Landlords of the Year" award, Smith said the landlord-tenant relationship works both ways. "I think the reason we get excellent tenants is because I lay down a firm line of what is expected," she said. In return, Smith provides yard maintenance by mowing the lawn, shoveling the snow and addressing problems quickly. "We feel that we owe it to the tenants. Students have other things on their agenda than shoveling the snow," she said.

"I think the tour is an excellent idea," said Mayor Gary Bennett. "What I've seen over the last five to six years is that students are accepting more responsibility for housing standards," he added.

City Councillor Don Rogers said there has been a "slow, steady and significant improvement" in student housing. "The MAC has filled an important gap because it empowers student tenants to seek appropriate redress when there are housing problems," he said.

Raising the bar

fact that the Faculty made the decision to admit additional first-year students this year, 608 as compared to 486 in 1997.

Bechtold indicated that the increased number of students in Applied Science "was a planned increase." In trying to increase the number of engineers, the provincial government has undertaken a new program, the Access To Opportunities Program. The program will provide additional money per engineering student if the university can increase enrolment in Applied Science by a minimum of 20 per cent of the 1995-96 enrolment figures.

"The Faculty wanted to get an early start on the increase," said Bechtold. "There was a tremendously strong applicant pool... It was an ideal opportunity without doing anything to decrease the standards of admission."

Average entering grade for students entering Queen's from high school or CEGEP was 86.8 per cent. The proportion with 75 per cent or higher was 92.8 per cent. Queen's leads the country with both statistics.

The number of males at the university in 1997 was 7,392 and the number of females was 9,145. This year the number of males stands at 7,580 and the number of females at 9,272. This gives the university a male/female ratio of 45/55, and an increase in male enrolment of 1.9 per cent.

Task Force introduces accessibility doors

By MANDY MARRIOTT

Queen's students are finding some buildings easier to access thanks to the 14 new power doors that were added in buildings across campus this summer.

The doors were installed with the aim of improving physical accessibility and cost approximately $53,600, jointly funded by the AMS Accessibility Task Force and Queen's.

Two doors were put in Botterell Hall, two in Ellis Hall, one in Humphrey Hall, two in Jeffery Hall, two in Stirling Hall, one in the Victoria School Building and two in Watson Hall.

Aaron Wong-Sing, a member of the Accessibility Task Force, said the decision to install the doors came about early last year, but it took most of the school year to get funding approved and to receive quotes and estimates on the price of the doors.

The Task Force is a committee run under the direction of the AMS Vice-President of University Affairs. It is funded through a $3 mandatory student fee paid at the beginning of the school year.

Alison Loat, AMS VP (UA), said Queen's is unique in the way it handles accessibility issues because students are so involved in the process. "It is a phenomenal commitment from Queen's students and this is different from other schools," Loat said, adding that, at many schools the majority of the funding for accessibility comes from the school itself.

The Accessibility Task Force was created in 1988 to meet Queen's students increasing need for accessibility on campus. Sing emphasized the need for continued upgrading of accessibility on campus. "Queen's prides itself on having a diverse make-up of students. If we want to accept people from all walks of life we must make [Queen's] accessible," he said.

The Task Force has improved accessibility on campus in other ways as well. It has taken on projects such as installing the Grey House ramp, putting a lift in the pool of the Physical Education Centre, and helping develop the Adaptive Technologies laboratory. Sing said in the new year the committee will be running a sign language course as well helping to co-ordinate an awareness week on issues surrounding disabilities.

In terms of improvements to buildings on campus, both Sing and Loat agree the Louise D. Acton building is in great need of improvements in terms of accessibility are especially essential because it is the rehabilitation building.

Society could remain independent

"trying to decide where the medical society naturally belongs."

While they accept that the recent inclusion of the Faculty of Law into the Society of Graduate and Professional Schools could help in making the transition from the AMS as smooth as possible, Billingsley said the Aesculapian Society is "not necessarily following the Law Society example."

Backo sees that the immediate future for an Aesculapian Society divorced from the AMS will likely include acceptance in the SGPS, but Billingsley said the society could also remain independent of other student governments at Queen's.

None of the medical students contacted by The Journal wished to comment on the impending referendum.

Prior to the meeting on November 26, the Aesculapian executives sent letters explaining their decision to AMS President Tom Stanley, SGPS President Chris Hales and members of the AMS executive and the administration.

"Although I had informal discussions with various people about the possibility, the actual official statement was a surprise to me," said Stanley.

In terms of AMS response to the statement, "I don't think it's a matter of appeasement or last minute scrambling to try to lock people in the AMS," Stanley said. "I hope that regardless of the outcome, we can look at the real substantive issues and look for general improvement."

"I think it's safe to say that deregulation of professional programs has exacerbated any differences [between programs] that did exist," Stanley continued. However, "I don't really feel that tuition increases would bring them any closer [to the SGPS]," he said.

While undergraduate programs experienced a 20 per cent increase this year, graduate programs experienced only a three per cent or CPI increase.

"I don't think that student government membership is defined by tuition level," Stanley added.

Hales said, "We weren't surprised [about the referendum] because we heard the rumours."

The LSS's recent transfer from the AMS made the SGPS realize that it needed a process by which groups could join and leave the society, Hales explained. The last reading of the procedure will occur this Tuesday and is expected to be in place by the end of January, he said.

"I don't think that student government membership is defined by tuition level."

— Tom Stanley, AMS President

Backo said the Dean of Student Affairs, the Dean of the School of Medicine and the Registrar's Office have been consulted to work out the logistics that would follow a "yes" answer.

"We want to be prepared and not leave anything to chance," explained Backo, "although we know there are always stumbling blocks."

The Aesculapian executive is developing a booklet for members of the Aesculapian Society, illustrating the pros and cons involved with the referendum decision. Backo affirmed that the executive plans to tackle the issue in an "open-eyed" manner. The executive wants society members to be aware of the consequences involved with leaving the AMS, joining the SGPS, or maintaining the existing position within the AMS, she added.

Backo said the primary consequence of leaving the AMS would be the loss of certain services, but, tied to the AMS, the society lacks appropriate representation.

The referendum is tentatively scheduled to take place during the second week of January. The Aesculapian Society is running the referendum itself, but wants to allow for the AMS to present its case to students in January before a decision is made.

Amnesty group supports human rights day

By Erik Missio

Next Thursday, Queen's Amnesty International is asking students to "keep the light on" for human rights awareness. The group distributed over 300 candles yesterday in the John Deutsch University Centre and Mac-Corry, with the hope that students will keep them lit in their windows on December 10.

The day marks not only the 25th anniversary of the Canadian wing of the Human Rights Organization, but the 50th year since the signing of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This declaration, intended to preserve basic fundamental rights such as freedom of expression and protection from arbitrary arrest, is consistently violated throughout the world.

The candles were distributed by members of QAI, along with copies of the UDHR and window signs declaring support for the recognition of human rights.

QAI Public Awareness Director Jacque Bellair said the candle campaign is an effective way to make people more conscious about the atrocities being committed against those who wished to exercise their basic freedoms without violence.

"Seeing a candle in the window [on December 10] will remind us how lucky we are to live in a country where we're able to write... or speak our minds," she said. "[We hope] people will try to ameliorate the situation, by getting more involved."

Heather Wirick, Artsci '01, plans on placing the candle in the window on December 10. "I think it's important to show support for those without the freedoms we take for granted. It's a small gesture, but it helps to increase awareness," she explained.

Danielle Nowakowski, Comm '02 agreed "No one should have to live in constant fear because they're a woman or because of what they believe in."

People should know what's going on in the world," she said.

Amnesty International, a non-denominational and non-governmental activist movement, works to prevent violations of human rights around the globe. The group focuses on "prisoners of conscience," people who remain imprisoned or harassed for their beliefs or for their nationality, religion or sexuality, Bellair explained.

Through writing to various heads of state and ambassadors on behalf of the prisoners, members of the QAI try to send the message that the world knows rights are being violated and wants something to be done about it. "Even if you don't get a response to what you've written, with all of the Amnesty International groups out there sending their own letters, you know the message is getting across," she said.

The group also embarks on a greeting card campaign each holiday season. By sending cards directly to those being imprisoned for their beliefs, QAI affirms to the prisoners of conscience that they are not alone.

Overlap 'bad political move'

whole week could be moved two days back or the original schedule could be maintained.

At last week's Alma Mater Society Assembly meeting, student leaders voiced their concerns on this issue.

Concurrent Education Student's Association president Lisa Mori said, "We're going to do our very best but it might come to the point where it won't be feasible."

Moving the entire week back two full days would result in many complications. The new schedule would interfere with officials at residence services who normally book the use of residence space for conference housing up until the beginning of Orientation Week. First-year students would be required to pay for two extra days of accommodation and food, and don and residence training would have to be more compact or moved back two days.

Finally, students would have to terminate their summer employment before the Labour day weekend.

Alex Tarantino, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society representative to the AMS, thinks not accommodating Jewish students would be a grave mistake. "It just seems very sad and seems like it would be a bad political move," he said.

Tarantino suggested reasons for not changing the week were merely excuses. "I'm just dissatisfied," he said.

Mori expressed the hope that Jewish students of the Queen's community will recognize the serious effort being made to both justly and logistically determine the solution to this problem, no matter what the result. "I hope people wouldn't see it as a failing of their student leaders," she said.

"I very much appreciate the seriousness with which students are looking at the issues and are working towards a compromise," said Crawford. He also emphasized that a compromise is the most optimal solution.

"We will have well over 2,000 first-year students, so it is important to organize planned activities," said Crawford.

Rosh Hashanah normally falls later in the year, and many Jewish students choose to miss classes to attend synagogue. However, many assembly members said choosing to miss the integral events of the two final days of first-year orientation could present a much greater loss.

"There are a whole lot of issues and we all have to compromise, but I don't think student's should be discriminated against," said Naomi Brunemeyer, AMS social issues commissioner. Brunemeyer emphasized that missing out on first-year activities would cost some first-year students the loss of "an important bonding experience."

Policy concerns some students

romantic or sexual relationships with anybody in your area of responsibility and then for the rest of the term, sexual or romantic relationships in your area of responsibility are strongly discouraged."

"The design is more or less an age-based one... There's a substantial age difference here in many cases," Hight said. Floor seniors tend to be second-year students while dons tend to be fourth-year or graduate students.

Hight said the policy is a long-standing one. "It certainly is nothing new. For years, the message to dons has been very clear: hands off," he said. "We put it right there in their terms of employment."

If a relationship formed between a don and a student under his or her jurisdiction, "we make it very clear that we would view that as inappropriate sexual contact and put their position at risk," he said.

"Fortunately, we don't have any history of this sort of thing but it would be treated very seriously."

The ISC policy has raised some concern among students. "When we first heard about it we thought it was a student/staff policy. We were outraged because we thought that was a clear violation of student rights," said Nick McGrath, first-year representative on the ISC student council. When council was informed it was a staff, not a student, policy, "we pretty much abandoned the issue because it wasn't a violation of student rights any more," he said.

"Since it doesn't apply to us directly, there's really nothing we can do about it," McGrath added.

"I understand where they're coming from but I don't really think that it's justifiable," McGrath said. "The reality is that it happens in the real world all the time."

"To be objective, I understand why it applies to first-years and not to upper-years, a lot of [first-year students] are 17..." said first-year ISC student Dana Stefov; however, she added, "I don't feel like I'm any less mature than upper-years would be a decision for myself."

"I understand why the policy was put into place but I think if they were going to make a policy like that they should have created it equally for all students," said third-year ISC student Samantha Springer. "Some of the first-years are the same age as I am... and are more mature than the upper-years."

Lessard emphasized the ISC's policies are not set in stone. "We have democratic mechanisms in place to change a policy if it appears to need changing," he said. "Issues of policy can be brought forward and modifications can be proposed."

Smoking options 'expensive'

smoking lounge in each residence, which would provide an indoor space for smokers. However, Brown notes that this would be an expensive endeavour because of the handling systems already in place in the residences.

Another proposed idea is to build kiosks, outdoor locations designated for smoking. Implementation of the kiosks would be expensive, Brown said, and he does not believe they would be consistent with the Queen's campus plan.

Outdoor smoking areas often become "insightly," Brown explained, due to cigarette butts left on the ground and the trash that gets thrown about the areas. In terms of the clean and friendly campus ambience Queen's would like to maintain, Brown sees these outdoor smoking refuges as potential sources of contention. Brown said the areas could also bring about serious safety problems if people are smoking outside at night.

"We do not want it to become a safety issue," Crawford said, adding, he will not advocate implementation without "looking hard at the issue." Crawford admitted he and others did not realize it would be such an expense to eliminate smoking in residences.

Brown said a recent survey showed most students to be in favour of a smoking ban in residences.

Jenn Roden, a first-year student living in Morris Hall, supports hanning smoking from residence rooms, but thinks there should be a smoking area inside the residences. Roden said she is "fine with smoking in residence as long as it's not in [her] room." If non-smokers do not want people smoking around them, then smokers should respect this and should go somewhere else, she said.

Heather MacLeod, first-year student and Gordon Hall resident, supports a complete smoking ban from residences. Because MacLeod has asthma, she is greatly affected by second-hand smoke. MacLeod said the ban is "definitely a good idea," and advocated tighter restrictions on smoking if the ban does not get enacted.

The organizers also hope the presence of lit-up student houses "should make the end of term grind a little more bearable," Hammill said.

The prize for the winning house would include dinner at a local restaurant and a holiday prize package, although Phillips hopes people would take part out of charity.

A table in Mac-Corry set up today, tomorrow, Monday and Tuesday between 12 and 4 p.m. where students can register for the contest. Students who cannot decorate a house but would like to give some money to the charity drive, can contact the organizers at 547-5498 to make a donation.

Why spend hundreds on an upgrade for your computer?
Hop on the Internet, spend nothing and get a

Retrograde

IF YOU READ MONDAY's Journal cover story on our server meltdown, you can imagine the kind of week we've been having with our computers. You can forgive me, then, if I get a little nostalgic for earlier days of computing, before viruses or networks or even hard drives. Just turn on the computer and instantly — instantly, mind you — the familiar blue screen and flashing cursor assure you that it is always READY.

Ah, my Commodore 64. Now, though, the old C64 and other classic computer and gaming systems aren't just things of the past. Thanks to emulators or emus, freeware programs available on the Internet, you can play all the old games — Atari, ColecoVision, Commodore, whatever — on your PC.

Now, these aren't just cheesy Windows versions of the low-res, low-colour games you played when you were a kid. These are the original games, the data taken from the original cartridges, 5¼" floppies and even stand-up arcade games, that run within an environment that so closely emulates the original system that you can hardly tell the difference.

Consider how difficult a computing problem this is. First of all, you really need to know what you're doing inside a computer. A prospective emu coder has to be able to read the schematics of a system that hasn't been manufactured in 10 or 15 years. This would require extensive knowledge of computer architecture.

Next, there's the problem of the processors. Obviously, old Atari cartridges and quarter-munching arcade games don't run on the same hardware as Windows 98. The processors in the old gaming systems are relatively slow and primitive, so before any code writing can begin, the PC has to be fooled into thinking that it's running one of the old CPUs. Fortunately, emulators for many CPUs manufactured in the seventies and eighties are readily available.

Then the operating code has to be retrieved from the original hardware. To convert the computer's machine language back into assembly, the language most of these systems were written in, the code has to run through a disassembler. Now, if you can understand assembly, you can understand the code.

And then comes the fun part: actually writing the emulator. Using the original code as a guide, a new program must be written, usually in a combination of C and assembly, that can run on a PC. After months of compiling, debugging and rewriting, you might end up with a functional emulator.

But you still don't have a game, just a system to run one on. The final step is to make an image of the original game, stored on a cartridge or on floppies, that your emulator can recognize.

In short, writing an emu requires intimate knowledge of computers, a whole lot of time, gobs of patience and more than a few trips back and forth to Radio Shack.

And people write these things. For free.

And the results are sometimes amazing. Seeing your Pentium computer running the Atari 2600's version of Defender is somewhat of a humbling experience. The computer's speakers, used to producing CD-quality music and sound effects, emit these ridiculous squeaks and buzzes. The monitor displays chunky representations of ships and aliens, rather than its usual sophisticated tay-traced images and realistic displays of blood and gore. In so many ways the games produced today are a hundred times better than anything created back then. So while most gamers are obsessing over Quake II and StarCraft, why does anyone bother playing Frogger anymore?

Defender for the Atari 2600 running on a Pentium machine. P.Uee pounding action.

"Another victim. Stay a while. Stay forever!" Impossible Mission II for the Commodore 64.

There's something infectious about those classic games. It's easy to see why we spent so many quarters and so much time in our friends' basements playing the things. They're simple and infuriating puzzles and you're certain you can solve them on the next game.

Also, creating an emulator is certainly a challenge for the gear-head who sets his or her mind to it.

But computer games are a part of our culture and someday, they'll be a part of our history. It would be a shame if Pacman were lost simply because the last piece of hardware that it could be played on rusted away. Many of the web pages on retrogaming are consumed with preserving games in their original form, down to the finest detail. Obviously, these games mean a lot to some people.

When Atari released Pong in 1972, it was the first time that people and computers got along on good terms. In the early eighties, gaming was a driving force in their popularization. And now that computers are a part of our lives every day, we should certainly preserve that early part of our relationship with them.

John Bowman suggests checking out www.classicgaming.com for information on emulators and ROM images of your favourite retro games.

Science news from around the world and beyond

Gobi Desert fossils reveal early mammal evolution

Fossils discovered by a joint American-Mongolian expedition in the Gobi Desert are settling some debates about an evolutionary split in early mammals. The new specimens of the dinosaur-era mammal Deltatheridium have skull features which tend to group it with marsupial mammals, like kangaroos and koalas, rather than placentals, which include the mammals we are most familiar with, including us. This grouping had been somewhat contentious before this discovery. The 80-million-year-old fossil skulls also show that Deltatheridium was a relatively large mammal for that time, with a skull nearly 5 cm in length. Deltatheridium was probably a carnivore, evidenced by its sharp canines and molars, feeding on lizards and smaller mammals.

Martian group chooses Canadian Arctic for test site

A group calling itself the Mars Society is planning to build a simulated Mars station on Devon Island, just north of Baffin Island in Canada's far north. An article in Wednesday's Globe and Mail reported that the Haughton Crater site on Devon Island is a good model for the conditions that exist on Mars. The uninhabited island is essentially an arctic desert, cold and dry, and the area around the Haughton Crater is a network of glacier-carved valleys, similar to those found on Mars. The aim of the project is to test the design of a habitable Mars station and to bring the idea of manned missions to Mars into the forefront. Mars Society president Robert Zubrin stated that he was excited about the element of danger that the arctic location poses. He explained that the danger was useful for training future Mars colonists. "Although the form of danger is much different than Mars," said Zubrin. "I mean, here it's polar bears and there it's other things."

Dishonorable discharge

AS IF THE TORONTO BLUE JAYS weren't already mired in enough doubt and uncertainty over their future, they now have to deal with a manager who seems to believe that feigning post-traumatic stress-disorder over a war he never fought in is a good idea.

Despite never having been a U.S. Marine in Vietnam, Tim Johnson has spent the last 30 years of his life misrepresenting himself as a Vietnam war veteran to his colleagues, the media and the public. As the manager of the Blue Jays this past season, Johnson is reported to have used his stories of life on the "front line" to motivate up to eight Jays players. True or not, lines like "If you think hitting home-runs is hard, try killing civilian children in south-east Asia" are hardly an inspiring tales to lift a beleaguered ball player out of a hitting slump. While the motif of going into battle may be a common metaphor in some locker-rooms, the use of violent war analogies taints the spirit of the sport and should not be condoned.

Johnson, who claims to have many friends who served in 'Nam, should also have known better than to belittle their sacrifices by capitalizing on their traumatic experiences. When he publicly tried to make amends with the Blue Jays' organization and its fans last week, he neglected to recognize that his lies may also have offended or slighted the thousands of veterans who actually fought in Vietnam. Johnson should extend his apology to these veterans.

It is hard to see him continuing in a leadership role now that his players know he tried to motivate them under false pretenses.

As for his future with the Blue Jays, it is hard to see him continuing in a leadership role now that his players know he tried to motivate them under false pretenses. After all, Johnson himself once told a reporter that "you can't bullshit baseball players, because they'll always see through it."

Looking the other way

A TRAGIC AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT last week left a Kingston mother without her husband and three children. A similar accident in the summer resulted in the death of Queen's student Mark Wilson and his family. In both cases, the word accident seems a misnomer considering that Mark and the other victims would still be alive if another driver had followed the law and not driven while impaired.

The proximity of these tragedies to our own lives forces us to confront the often fatal consequences of driving while under the influence of alcohol. However, move a safe distance from the salient horror of a friend or neighbor dying and our actions and attitudes towards driving drunk seem to contradict any understanding of the seriousness of this issue. Despite the fact that 40 per cent of all motor vehicle fatalities in Canada involve alcohol use, it is not uncommon for many of us to watch friends get behind the wheel after having a few drinks. This reluctance to respect the law in our own lives is clearly at odds with the overwhelming evidence that driving while impaired is dangerous. Instead of blaming the problem on criminals and expecting the police to keep the roads safe, we should recognize that driving responsibly means no exceptions — even when it is inconvenient not to drive. It is too easy to draw a distinction between drunk drivers who have caused fatalities, and those who are simply negligent in their judgment — both are criminals.

With the holiday season approaching, many of us may find ourselves in a position to stop a friend or family member from drinking and driving, or even face the decision of whether or not to get behind the wheel ourselves. When confronted with the choice between looking the other way and stepping in, please remember: we share the road with each other and we have a responsibility to make sure everyone is safe.

Behind a veil of ignorance

SOMETHING THAT HAPPENED in the waning months of high school has really stuck with me. I was in the library, sitting on one of the old couches near the big window reading a magazine. Among the other people there were a couple of girls who could be considered the social conscience of the school. Each year they 'emceed' all the assemblies on AIDS, racism, drunk driving and anything else. They too were reading a magazine, Seventeen — the most popular magazine in the library.

The troublesome incident occurred when they reached the "School Zone" feature in which pictures of fashionable students from some American high school are presented. The two girls proceeded to mock the names of people from other ethnic groups. I was, and remain, stunned by this. For the longest time, I wondered how seemingly intelligent, and soundly aware people could be so ignorant.

I'm glad it bothered me for such a long time because I think I've been able to figure out what the problem is. It stems from the idea of multiculturalism. An idea that is brilliant. Unfortunately, for all intents and purposes it remains, for the most part, just an idea. Multiculturalism has gone from being an ambitious policy initiative by the Trudeau government to a vacuous mission statement typical of the late 1990s.

For those of us who have grown up with the idea of multiculturalism being taught to us in school and in the media, it seems to have become just enough to say that, by living in Canada, we are impli-city not racist. Sadly, as my story about the two girls shows, this is simply not true.

The more you look around, the more you will see that multiculturalism doesn't exist in any tangible form. School curriculums are unaffected. Government has done little or nothing to effect real change. Canadian institutions like the RCMP which should lead the way have been loathe to change their ways, as was demonstrated by the turban fiasco a few years ago.

Despite this evidence, Canadians like the ones from my high school would in all likelihood use multiculturalism as a major point in their answer to 'what is Canada?' or 'what does it mean to be Canadian?' or some similarly insipid pursuit. In the same way, multiculturalism would be cited as one of the main differences between Canada and the United States. While most Canadians would say there is no direct parallel between the ongoing race problem in the States and anything in Canada, one needs only to turn to our east and ask ourselves why Quebec might have elected Lucien Bouchard this week.

The most disturbing thing about multiculturalism is the way that most Canadians use the term to absolve themselves of being racist or any responsibility to actually understand and accept the differences inherent in other cultures. The sooner multiculturalism starts to mean something and isn't just a veil behind which serious racial issues in this country are hidden, the better off we'll all be.

An evolution revolution

ANDREW PARKER WROTE in his article "Darwin in the Raw" (The Queen's Journal, Friday, November 13, 1998), "the theory of evolution is profound for the very fact that it eliminates faith and supposition and spirituality and it focuses on the truth. It is truth based on evidence, and it is quite irrefutable."

The theory of evolution is not truth, not is it irrefutable. The theory of evolution is being undermined not by religious groups alone, but by respected scientists, and even self-confessed evolutionists. The creation-evolution debate has focused on homology, fossils, and natural selection.

The term "homology" is used to describe similarities in basic structure, for which there are two different ideas; descent from a common ancestor and creation according to a common plan. The first problem with the notion of descent is that homologous structures "often develop under the control of genes that are not homologous," (Gary Parker, Creation: The Facts of Life, p.41). The second is that classification of groups by homologous structures always results in different groups according to which structure is used as the focus (see Michael Denton, Evolution: A Theory in Crisis). Humans and vertebrates, and cephalopod mollusks (eg. squid and octopus) have strikingly similar eyes, while members of the same sub-species can have very complex and differing features (for example, see Michael Land, "Nature as an Optical Engineer," New Scientist, October 4, 1979, for divergent eye structures of shrimp-like creatures that are impossible to explain by evolutionary theory).

Vital links to support the theory of evolution of species from common ancestry haven't been found. Evolutionists have tried to support their views by searching the fossil record, and have yet to find any evidence of transitional species.

Evolutionists agree that Neanderthal Man was no different than man today, only with larger brain volume. Apes and man co-existed.

Darwin was embarrassed by the evidence provided by fossils and the years of fossil research since The Origin of Species have made the case for evolution worse. For example, evolutionists agree that Neanderthal Man was no different than man today, only with larger brain volume. As far back as the fossil record goes, apes and man co-existed. The missing link is still missing. The evidence is consistent with development according to a common plan rather than descent from a common ancestor.

In discussing natural selection, it is important to stress here other writings of Theodosius Dobzhansky. Natural selection does not explain the origin of species or traits, only their presentation (Evolution, 1977, with F. Ayala, L. Stebbins, and J. Valentine, consistent with the quote cited by Andrew Parker from the Globe and Mail). The evidence is supportive of natural selection through extinction or migration of species and not improvement through evolution.

While DNA and thus organisms may be cloned, chemical evolution from a "primordial soup" (i.e. the basic chemical building blocks) has not been possible. Evolution through mutation has also been explored, and as a result, mathematic evolutionists concluded in 1967 at the Wistar Institute in Philadelphia, that mutations could not serve the basis of evolution.

Science isn't anti-religious nor anti-God. The use of science is becoming more and more pro-creationist. Science cannot disprove the world was created in seven days, nor can it disprove that Adam and Eve did tread in the Garden of Eden and the Big Bang theory is not universally accepted (see Dr. Russell Humphreys, Starlight and Time, 1994). As Dr. Gary Parker writes, "the creation-evolution controversy, far from being a dead issue, is a live and lively question that demands serious scientific consideration."

Regardless of which theory we may each hold our faith in, we should all consider facts, hypotheses, and assumptions scientists make in this ongoing debate.

Letters to the Editors

Unite for December 6

Dear Editors,

We are writing to address the article written by Eva Dillon in this week's Golden Words supplement on December 6. We are writing to The Journal in an attempt to shed some light on these issues before the memorial service and before students leave for the winter break. We are sincerely hurt and feel betrayed by the fact that a member of our own collective after agreeing to decisions made would negate them in the December 6 supplement. The supplement is not the forum for an attack. This serves only to divide the women on campus further and to take away from the tragedy at hand.

We would like to take this opportunity to inform not only members of the Engineering Society, but the rest of the Queen's community about some of the inclusive events that Ms. Dillon neglected to mention.

The collective is a group composed of men and women representing themselves and socially aware groups on campus. There are three members of the Engineering Society on the collective, two of which are men.

There are two marches occurring on campus this year for the first time. There is both a women's march and a men's march that unite at the end to speak out. During the memorial service Alex Downie, the special assistant to the Dean of Applied Science and Sci '90 graduate will be reading a speech prepared by Dr.

Monique Frize, P. Eng., O.C.

The reading of the names of the fourteen engineering women killed will be read by fourteen Queen's engineering women.

Aside from the blatant inaccuracies of this article, we feel that it is misrepresenting the issues of December 6. Although we acknowledge that the fourteen women killed were engineering students, we would like to suggest that at the end of the rampage, fourteen women were dead and all their male colleagues were alive and unharmed.

December 6 is a clear example of violence against women, but never forget about the countless other women who fall prey to male violence every year.

We also think it is relevant to mention that Marc Lepine named other prominent non-engineering feminists within his community that he had planned to kill. December 6 highlights the issues of violence against all women and the misogyny that still exists. December 6 is a clear example of violence against women but we must never forget about the countless other nameless women that fall prey to male violence every year.

Articles such as this suggest that engineering women don't want the support of other women on campus and that other groups of women could possibly not empathize or be affected by violence. We as a collective feel that this is not the case and as such have worked hard to fight violence against women in all of its forms.

The December 6 Collective

I don't want to wait, either

Dear Editors,

I am writing in response to Sarah Crosbie's article "I Don't Want to Wait" in the November 27 issue of The Journal. I completely agree with her point about living "everyday to its fullest" because "life is sweet, precious and unfortunately, sometimes too short." My uncle, Queen's Engineering Alumni, died suddenly last December of a heart attack at the mere age of 57. One day he was alive, a happily married father of four with a granddaughter, a grandson on the way, and the founder of a large, successful computer company, and the next day he was gone, leaving his family and friends without the chance for goodbyes. We know he loved us deeply, but his death shocked us all. It forced me to recognize the fragility of human life and made me realize how important it is to tell those I love how special they are to me. Edwath Young once said: "All men think all men are mortal but themselves." My uncle's death made me realize we are not invincible and tragedy can strike anytime, cutting life short for any of us. Thus, we should "seize the day" and take full advantage of nity this year. Unfortunately, Eric Ring has unjustly made us out as trying to be something we are not.

I agree with Eric: we are not a ska-jazz band, or even a ska band for that matter. There may be certain elements of these genres in our sound, but we have never tried to steer our music in that direction, nor have we ever promoted ourselves in this way. The term "ska-jazz" was used in one Journal article to describe and not necessarily categorize our sound. In the past, The Journal has also described our sound as a mix of everything from blues to funk to hip-hop to punk. I think that this vague description of our sound stems from the fact that we are influenced by the broad range of musical backgrounds of each member in the band. I do not believe it was fair of Eric to judge Franklin's Fault based on this somewhat inaccurate categorization of our music.

Again, there are some other things on which I would agree with Eric concerning our sound: I would be the first person to admit that we are not polished (sometimes we can be downright sloppy). However, I definitely believe Eric has made some very unjustified critiques on certain members of the band.

The horns may not have been loud enough for Eric's ska-oriented tastes, but due to the wide range of music we play and the different roles the horns play in each song, it is difficult for the individuals operating the sound board to find a consistently appropriate volume for the horns.

Don Duval is an exceptional (though modest) guitarist. This is an opinion shared by many people, including the judges of the QEA Battle of the Bands last spring. There was not a single judge who did not rave about his playing. Don has a style that is distinctly his own and is definitely the backbone of the Franklin's Fault sound.

The place where I believe Eric is most unfair is in his blatant attack on our vocalists. Kris Bruun and Kate Ann Vandermeer are both amazing singers and we could not ask for two better people to front the band. Check out Kris and Kate in Queen's Musical Theatre and Queen's Players and tell me they are not incredible. Regardless of my opinion, I think it takes a pretty heartless person to pick on the talents of these individuals.

Eric suggested that we "do it right, or don't do it at all," but I really don't think he understands what "it" is. We're about having fun, plain and simple. We play music that we enjoy and that we hope our friends will love to hear. When people are dancing and singing along with our songs, there is no greater compliment to the band. But no matter how much fun the audience is having, no one has more fun at a Franklin's Fault show than Franklin's Fault. I think this is apparent in our performance and is the aspect of the band that our audience appreciates most. If you want to hear some polished music performed by a group of very capable and proficient musicians, go see Bloom and Travel Agent. If you just want to go out, hear some good tunes and enjoy yourself, come see Franklin's Fault.

THE JOURNAL

A historic rivalry in a nutshell

ACCORDING TO JONATHAN KRASHINSKY

Jonathan Krashinsky is co-editor of Golden Words

I GOT THE CALL LATE ONE afternoon.

Days earlier, I had been "purchased" by The Journal at a charity genie auction for the astounding price of...well, I don't want to talk about it. Expecting the worst, I dreaded the first contact that would present me with the depth of depravity that they would force upon me to fulfill my responsibilities to them as a genie. "They are dangerous at the best of times," I reasoned to myself, "but after we at GW beat them at paintball like we did, they're liable to be vicious." What would it be? Would I have to distribute subversive propaganda? Poach endangered animals? Write favorable reviews of Jewel albums? What?

"We want you to write this week's Features section about the rivalry between The Journal and Golden Words," they said.

Oh. Well, that doesn't sound so bad...

Golden Words, publishing its first "issue" in 1967, was originally little more than a flyer for the advertisement of engineering events. Indeed, the original editor of GW, Bax Stephenson, wrote in GW's first editorial that "at present, we see [Golden Words] acting as a supplement to the JOURNAL providing coverage of those items which should be of interest to the [Engineering] faculty which are not covered by the JOURNAL at the present time." Along with a stern letter from the president of the Engineering Society responding to charges that the Engineering Society was neglecting its members, this was the mandate for GW's existence. And thus GW was born.

A supplement to The Journal, eh? Well...not quite. The first issue of GW also features the cartoon included here, with an aristocratic engineer perusing a copy of The Journal and dryly proclaiming "Oh, what crap is this?" And thus, a rivalry was born too.

This original dual nature of GW — at the same time a supplement of The Journal and a bunch of Engineering students getting a few laughs at said publication's expense — hung around for a while. In the first few years of GW's existence, it was almost exclusively a four- or eight-page forum for the Engineering Society to communicate with its members about relevant issues and advertise upcoming events that pertained to engineers. Traditionally, however, it was also much more irreverent than The Journal, never packaged as a newspaper with any level of objectivity. Well, give a bunch of students an open forum and free beer on Press Nite (a practice that GW mercifully discontinued about ten years ago), and watch the publication turn to comedy.

THE FIRST ATTACK: GW wastes no time in its inaugural issue, printed on January 24, 1967, where the above editorial cartoon becomes the first in a long history of Journal swipes.

In 1977, The Journal retorts in this rare spoof of GW (Left), a glossary of bathroom humour laden with the glorification of breasts and genitalia.

There is no clear line of when GW made the change — after all, it still today serves in a more limited form as a forum for EngSoc to communicate to its members — but by the early seventies, the change was made. Golden Words was now the official humour paper of Queen's campus.

And what better targets for these upstart engineer-writers than The Journal? After all, by the time GW had become committed to being primarily a humour paper, it had also changed from the traditional format of "publish an issue whenever the hell we can scrape together the money through advertising and begging" (a format to which many campus pub-

A cornucopia of MiSC. holiday treats

COMPILED BY JESSE CRAIG BELLINGER

A MISCELLANY OF HOLIDAY INFORMATION:

Happy Holy Days

It may surprise some to know that not everyone celebrates Christmas. Kwanzaa (Quansa) is a holiday celebrated by many African-Americans, held December 26th through January 1st. It was started in 1966 by Doctor Maulana Karenga, Professor at the California State University, Long Beach, California.

The seven day celebration encourages people to think about their African roots as well as their life in present day

America. Kwanzaa is based on African festivals and means, literally, "the first fruits."

Hanukkah, the Festival of Lights, is celebrated by followers of the Jewish faith. It is celebrated for eight days, commencing on the 25th day of the month of Kislev (November/December), to commemorate the victory of the Jews over the Hellenist Syrians in 165 BCE.

Following their victory, the Maccabees, sons of the Priestly Hasmonean family which led the Jews in their revolt against the Syrian overlords, entered the Holy Temple in Jerusalem defiled by the Syrian invaders, cleansed it and dedicated it anew to the service of God. Then, in memory of their victory, the Maccabees celebrated the first Hanukkah. (Hanukkah is the Hebrew term for dedication).

The most important observance associated with Hanukkah is the kindling of the Hanukkah lights on the Menorah or Hanukkiya, a seven- or nine-branch candelabrum. On each night more light is kindled, beginning with one candle on the first night of Hanukkah and ending with eight on the final evening. The lighting is accompanied by the chanting of appropriate blessings and the singing of songs. The ninth branch is reserved for the shamash, the servant light, which is lit first and used to kindle the other lights of the Menorah.

Christmas in Translation

"Merry Christmas" is spoken in many languages around the world. In Rome, and throughout the greater part of Latin Christendom, it was "The Feast of the Nativity;" in Greece "Genethlia," having the same meaning. The French Noël is more mysterious. It may be from the Provençal Nadal (itself from the Latin Natalis), with which the Italian Natale and the Welsh Nadolig (probably also Gaelic Nollaig) are compared. Others perceive it through the form Nowell or Nouvelles, which means "news." Italian has Nativita, clearly linked to the Spanish Navidad. Germany's Weihnacht means "the holy or consecrated night," though it is also interpreted to come from Wein-nacht or "wine night." "Christmas" follows the pattern of adding the syllable -mas to the name of the person being celebrated (as in the more obscure Michaelmas, for example). Opinions differ as to the origin of "-mas," however. Hebrew implies its meaning as "tribute" or "offering" (Deuteronomy 16:10), while French changes "mas" to messe (via the Latin missa).

yet to be classified.

2) There are 2 billion persons under 18 in the world. As Santa doesn't (appear) to handle the non-Christian children of the world, that reduces the total to 378 million children expecting a visit from Santa on Christmas Eve. Assuming an average of 3.5 children per household, that's 91.8 million homes. One presumes there's at least one good child in each.

3) Santa has 31 hours of Christmas to work with, thanks to the different time zones and the rotation of the earth, assuming he travels east to west. This works out to 822.6 visits per second. This is to say that for each Christian household with good children, Santa has 1/1000th of a second to park, hop out of the sleigh, jump down the chimney, fill the stockings, distribute the remaining presents under the tree, eat whatever snacks have been left, get back up the chimney, get back into the sleigh and move on to the next house.

Assuming that each of these 91.8 million stops are evenly distributed around the earth, this results in 0.78 miles per household, a total trip of 75 half-million miles, not including stops. This means that Santa's sleigh is moving at 650 miles per second, or 3,000 times the speed of sound. For purposes of comparison, the fastest human-made vehicle on earth, the Ulysses space probe, moves at a poky 27.4 miles per second by comparison. A conventional reindeer can run at a top speed of 15 miles per hour.

lications still subscribe — hi, Surface!) to a more or less weekly publication schedule. The Journal, the only other publication on campus which subscribed to this format, seems as likely a candidate as any for sustained ridicule.

Objectively, of course, there's no good reason for The Journal and GW to be rivals. After all, the two papers, although catering to the same student body, hardly occupy the same niche. The Journal is structured along the lines of a newspaper, restricting its comedy (if any is included at all) to editorial cartoons and the occasional comic strip. Golden Words, on the other hand, is devoted to comedy, restricting its news element primarily to engineering content in the "This is For Real" section. Thus, any rivalry between the two is really like the rivalry between an elephant and a cheetah — even if they don't like each other, the elephant is too big for the cheetah to hunt it, and the cheetah is too fast for the elephant to stomp it. Nonetheless, two bug in a jar and watch them fight!

Neither paper has any particular moral high ground. GW, which wallows in its own crapulence (and damn proudly!), regularly publishes a parody of The Journal, which has also alternately marched under the title "The Jurnill" and "The Urinal." The Journal, for its part, has come out swinging on a few occasions with parodies of their own, titled "Golden Werdz." Incidentally, both publications have done parody issues of Surface, a publication infamous for such atrocities as "The Sex Issue" and articles like "How To Make Love To A White Boy." Historically, each paper has taken shots at the other in their particular style. GW, for its part, strikes alternately with satire and with cheap shots at poor Journal spelling. The Journal, in turn, replies with editorials decrying the latest GW excess. Repeat as needed. However, it is a rare year that there is any real enmity between the two publications. Notwithstanding the regular GW-Journal conflict of two years ago, most of the time the two papers get along as well as could be expected, kind of like a funny man-straight man pair from a fifties comedy show. In honest reflection, the rivalry between The Journal and Golden Words is usually more flash than substance, an excuse for some cheap jokes every so often on the part of Golden Words and some cheap articles every so often about the latest "GW scandal" on the part of The Journal.

GW strikes alternately with satire and with cheap shots at poor Journal spelling. The Journal replies with editorials decrying the latest GW excess. Repeat as needed.

Moreover, when it comes down to it, the two papers look after each other, not only in practice but even in principle. As long ago as 1990, hardly a banner era for good taste in the GW circle, The Journal published a cover story reporting that Principal David Smith was offended by an issue of Golden Words, which featured a picture of a person...ahem...defecating, and an article entitled "How to Screw." Clearly, the Principal was not offended by that particular issue per se, but rather had a pickle up his ass about the very existence of Golden Words on "his" campus. The article reported that Principal Smith was considering a number of actions that were aimed towards the strangulation of Golden Words financially, encompassing both a suspension of student fees supporting GW (which, incidentally, have always supported only the TIFR section — the rest of the paper is paid for by advertising) and personal appeals to the advertisers to cease doing business with GW. Ostensibly, The Journal article was an objective look at the issue. However, even a news story has some degree of bias, and The Journal here subtly but unmistakably supported GW and ridiculed both the stormtrooper tactics of Smith and, more generally, the idea that the paper should be shut down because one man decided that he didn't like what it said.

This is only a single example. However, more generally, it is an unspoken tradition that The Journal and GW will more or less work together. For example, even in the '96-'97 publication of Golden Words on "his" campus. The article reported that Principal Smith was considering a number of actions that were aimed towards the strangulation of Golden Words financially, encompassing both a suspension of student fees supporting GW (which, incidentally, have always supported only the TIFR section — the rest of the paper is paid for by advertising) and personal appeals to the advertisers to notes in the actual text of articles). It wasn't in a vacuum; a Dean actually stated on record that Queen's Admin was "embarrassed" by The Journal, which is no longer the case. In the same way, while The Journal's reaction to the scandal about last year's Journal parody issue may have filled an excessive number of cover articles for them, it did nonetheless make an impression on both the GW executive of the time and the upcoming exec, not to mention EngSoc. "Maybe," it made GW consider, "we were a little overboard with that one." Not for sure, mind you, but maybe. And maybe it's good that each paper makes sure that the other doesn't go too overboard for extended periods of time. When Timothy Scott's "Out of Left Field" column regularly abused our sensibilities two years ago, GW's mockery of the crap that regularly flowed from Scott's pen was less a personal outcry than a more general representation of the discontent of a large part of the Queen's community. For its part, GW is probably less likely to do something completely outrageous knowing that The Journal is watching. Everybody needs moderation every so often, and a publication is no exception.

For 33 years, the two giants of campus media have co-existed at the same university. Sometimes, the two publications don't see eye-to-eye; most of the time, they get along well enough in spite of it. Often enough, each has more to worry about from their own internal weaknesses than from attack by the other. And sometimes, they can even help each other out. Hmm... that's too damn "feel good" to end this piece. Oh right, GW shot The Journal with paintballs until they got wet and lost and begged GW never to shoot them with paintballs again, and then they cried. Ah. That's better. Jonathan Krashinsky can be seen at this Sunday's Journal year-end celebration as the event's celebrity bartender.

Men's rugby on probation

By ADAM KAMINSKY

The season has gone from bad to worse for the Queen's rugby club. After their worst season in more than a decade, they were caught drinking on a team bus and now face sanctions. The team has been suspended from participating in this year's Colours Night, an evening that honours varsity athletes, and are on probation for the next two years.

"There were documented examples of two trips where players and possibly coaching staff were drinking on the bus returning from an event," said Director of Athletics and Recreation John McFarlane. "This is clearly an infraction of the rules."

Drinking on a team bus is clearly stated as inappropriate conduct in the policy section of the Guidelines on Conduct for Division of Athletics and Recreation. This code of conduct reads that teams are to "refrain from the consumption of alcohol while traveling to and from and at the site of athletic events/competitions, contests, or practices." In the same section, a second article states that "the consumption of alcohol on Queen's transport is strictly prohibited."

The rugby team is not questioning whether their actions were wrong, they are simply disappointed with the magnitude of the penalty.

"This was in contravention of Queen's rules. Some 80 per cent of intercollegiate teams at Queen's do this in some way, form or manner, but we got caught and paid the price," said veteran Head Coach Al Ferguson. "It is like speeding on the 401, everyone does it, but when you get caught you just have to take your ticket home and deal with it."

"The lack of an invitation to Colours Night is unfortunate for our graduating players," continued Ferguson. "It is especially tough because we did not disgrace the team or the school." While McFarlane and head of interuniversity sports Janean Sergeant have cast their decision and it has been ratified by the University Council of Athletics, Emmer Connolly, captain of the squad, is challenging the penalty.

"It is like speeding on the 401, everyone does it, but when you get caught you just have to take your ticket home and deal with it."

— Head Coach Al Ferguson

"I don't think the punishment fits the crime," said Connolly, a fourth-year player. "I will be meeting with the administration soon. I have advocated to Janean that I go out and talk about responsible drinking and driving in local high schools as an alternative punishment. There is a chance that the administrators will hopefully change the penalty."

With Connolly going through the appropriate channels of appeal, anything is possible, but to McFarlane the issue is fairly straight forward.

"There is a line and when a group of individuals cross that line, they will deal with the consequences," explained McFarlane.

"If you are going to have these rules, they should be more enforceable," said Ferguson. "I sympathize with John McFarlane and Janean Sergeant because they have to have these regulations in place and they are hard to enforce."

"We have had one rule, and that is not to get out of control, but in theory what we were doing is illegal," lamented the coach. "I guess we got our speeding ticket so to speak."

Queen's sweeps homestand

By NATHAN SAGER

During the frenetic final minutes, the Gaels first opened a seven-point lead, then Concordia clambered back, tying the score with a minute remaining. With 47 seconds showing, guard Brendan Byrne lost the ball at midcourt, leading to a pair of free throws and a two-point Stingers' lead. The Gaels quickly reciprocated as Derek Richardson, who had a team-high 17 points, sunk two clutch shots from the charity stripe to tie the score at 71.

On Friday night, the quicker Stingers surged to an early 15-point lead behind a suffocating defensive press which generated two 8-0 runs during the match's first 13 minutes. At this point, the Gaels regrouped, patiently gnawing away at the deficit, narrowing it to five points by halftime.

"I felt certain we could come back," said Queen's Head Coach Scott Meeson. "With the veteran club we have, sometimes we're more confident when we get behind early."

Early in the second half, Queen's pivotman John Purdy fouled out, thrusting reserve Mark Bednis to the forefront. With Bednis, fellow reserve Rob Sharrard, and power forward Peter Stelter collaborated to rein in Concordia centre Jay Prosper (24 points, 14 rebounds). The Gaels eradicated an eight-point deficit, then took their first lead of the night on a Stelter try with eight minutes remaining.

After holding off the Stingers on their ensuing possession, the Gaels moved up court for the final shot. As Richardson brought the ball over centre court, the Stingers stole up to contest a possible three-point shot, whereupon Richardson incisively whipped a pass to Bednis standing unoccupied under the basket for the decisive hoop with 2.4 seconds remaining.

"We just kept persevering," enthused Meeson in the aftermath of the dramatic win. "The great thing is, we finally won a close game... the guys who had to step up tonight, did so."

Besides Richardson and Bednis (11 points on 5-of-6 shooting), the backcourt tandem of Byrne and Mike Gleeson totalled 26 points.

The outcome of Saturday's contest was somewhat less left open to question, as the Gaels led from wire to wire, opening a 15-point lead midway through the first half, and leading 47-24 at intermission. After fouling out the evening previ-

Gaels split weekend games

By NICK SINCLAIR

The Queen's women's basketball squad concluded the pre-Christmas portion of its schedule with two games that could not have been any more different.

Concordia 53, Queen's 51
Queen's 67, McGill 34

A week ago today the Gaels lost a heartbreaker to Concordia 53-51. Whatever frustration Dave Wilson's troops may have felt over losing their home-opener was properly channeled as the team took no prisoners in a 67-34 mauling of McGill.

"[The Concordia] loss was heartbreaking," said team captain Wendy Moon. "We didn't play up to our potential and lost to a team we had beaten before."

In the first game, it may very well have been the case that four of the five best players on the court were from the home team. However, Concordia's Carol-Anne Tull, a one-woman show to say the least, torched Queen's to the tune of 24 points and 10 rebounds. With four seconds left on the clock she registered the game-winning basket by knocking down a baseline jumper over top of two defenders. Queen's set up a play desperately hoping to tie things up but failed to get a shot off before the buzzer sounded.

"[The Concordia] loss was heartbreaking," said team cap-

Leading the way for Gaels was Wendy Moon who had 14 points.

In contrast, Saturday's matchup was effectively over shortly after the opening tip. Three-pointers by Steph Glancey, Jacqueline Beaudoin and Tammy Cooper, along with the dominant low-post play of Moon, Erin Cressman and Jen Jackson contributed to a whopping 32 point halftime lead. McGill fared a little better in the final 20 minutes, but it was too little too late for the Martlets, who didn't score their 20th point until there was less than 10 minutes remaining.

"If we learned anything this fall, it is that we have to be ready for everything in this league," said Moon. "I have been playing in this league for five years and every weekend some of the results surprise me. It depends who comes to play."

By virtue of their split with the Montreal schools, the Gaels saw their national ranking slide two spots from number 8 to number 10. Nonetheless, the team has reached the lengthy break for exams and holidays with a respectable 4-2 record. The next time they hit the floor, the Gaels will be participating in a holiday tournament in Waterloo from January 1 - 3. The regular-season resumes with a home game against nemesis University of Toronto, January 9.

In the game

Women's hockey

The women's hockey team travelled to Princeton where their usually solid goaltending collapsed against the powerful Princeton and Northeastern offences. Queen's lost to Princeton 7-0 and their anemic offensive production continued with a 10-0 loss to Northeastern.

Men's hockey

The men's hockey team lost both of their road games last weekend to top-10 squads, McGill and Ottawa. On Saturday, McGill bested Queen's in a 6-4 shootout, Matt Thorne contributing two goals in a losing cause. Queen's then traveled to Ottawa where the Gee-Gees were able to shut down the Gael offence completely with a 5-0 victory on Sunday.

Women's volleyball

In women's volleyball action, the Gaels lost a tough battle at home to Ottawa 3-2. This puts their regular season record at 3-2, comfortably in fourth place in the OUA East.

Men's water polo

In an otherwise dismal water polo season, the men's team did have one shining star in John Godoy. Godoy was recognized for his outstanding season by being named an OUA second-team all-star.

Outstanding athletes honoured

By ROBERT MACNEIL

As the fall semester comes to a close, our outstanding varsity and intramural athletes were honoured at a Tuesday afternoon ceremony at the Grizzly Grill.

For Golden Gael varsity athletes, four men and four women were chosen as the best athletes from September to November.

Soccer's Amanda Foran, who played a pivotal role in leading the Gaels to an undefeated regular season, received the latest of her many accolades. Foran has also been honoured this year as an OUA and CIAU athlete of the week.

Paula Myslivecek, who was both a OUA and Queen's Journal athlete of the week, won the OUA singles title in tennis, and contributed to the team winning the Gaels' first OUA championship of the year.

Charlotte Wilson, of the cross-country team, performed admirably at the CIAU championships in Waterloo with a tenth-place finish in the five kilometre race with a time of 18:45.20.

Anne Benedetti, a coach and player on the women's lacrosse team, continued to receive more awards for her remarkable year. In a season in which her team won the first-ever OUA lacrosse championship, Benedetti was named Queen's Journal athlete of the week, OUA all-star, top scorer, most valuable player and coach of the year along with Darcie Spearing and Nancy Symons.

On the men's side, football's Paul Correale finished the season with a remarkable 1,144 total yards and made a full recovery from a spleen injury. In his first game back, he rushed for 215 yards and solidified the Gael offence.

Soccer's Mike Cowan finished his season with 13 goals and was named to the OUA all star team. One highlight in his first season was his back-to-back hat trick games against Ryerson and Brock. Men's rugby player Paul Hemings, who was a big scorer all year for his team, reached his peak in a match versus McMaster this season when he scored all 22 Queen's points in a 22-19 victory.

The men's volleyball team is led by the talented Jake Magolan. Magolan is second in the nation in total number of kills, and leads in blocks per game.

On the intramural scene, outstanding first-year participants and BEWS and WIC participants were honoured. Graduate student Sarah Rosden was honoured for her participation in touch football and ice hockey this semester. Rosden was honoured as she exemplified the camaraderie and fun that intramurals are supposed to reflect. First-year ArtSci students Steve Brewer and Megan Fitzpatrick were honoured for their interest in the Arts '02 teams and their role as team managers.

Outstanding BEWS athletes, from the men's program, were Mark Dilworth, ArtSci '99 and Daniel Raponi, ConEd '01. Dilworth manages two sports, plays several others, is a chief official, a faculty rep to intramurals for the ArtSci faculty and sits on several committees. Raponi also manages and plays for several intramural teams.

Outstanding WIC female athletes honoured were Julie Hurst, Rehab '99 and Saskia Harvey, ArtSci '99. Hurst is a faculty rep, a chief official, an evening supervisor for the program and plays on every Rehab team. Harvey has been respected for years for her dedication to the program and continues to aid in the development of intramural sports.

These athletes epitomized the best of an incredibly talented pool of individuals. Congratulations to all winners on a memory-filled first semester.

Captains meeting draws mixed reactions

then looked into and they then decided to have a captains meeting to deal proactively with the situation."

With sanctions and probation being handed down to these varsity teams it became clear to the administration that a set of guidelines and penalties had to be outlined with all teams being involved in the process.

"The athletes and coaches have shared with me the positives of these activities, but when activities are promoted that can result in personal injury, property damage or image damage, I think we have a responsibility to deal with it," said McFarlane. "I would be remiss not to mention that this has been influenced by recent initiation incidents at McMaster, with rugby and volleyball, and Western football."

Many of the 'rookie night' problems were originally reported by officials from Queen's residences.

"This fall it was brought to my attention several times that men and women were returned in a state of very great intoxication in addition to various materials being stuck on them," said Graham Brown, director of Queen's residences. "The worst has been avoided to date but a lot has to do with luck. I don't think personal safety should rely on luck."

Following the meeting, which attempted to create a policy to deal with these situations in the future, a number of captains put forth concerns and complaints.

Some felt that the administration, though absent in body, was exerting their influence on the captain's meeting.

"The sense I got was that the IAC people there wanted to get a rubber stamp from the captains for their sanctions," said cross-country captain Bob McGill. "The captains successfully questioned what was put forth."

"Men and women were returned [to residence] in a state of very great intoxication in addition to various materials being stuck on them."

— Grohom Brown, director of Queen's residences

While there was a consensus among captains that anything dangerous or in contravention of an individual's human rights was to be outlawed, some felt that the administration was going too far.

"Captains were concerned about punishing illegal activities such as harassment versus punishing simply getting intoxicated," said McGill.

"[The heavy drinking] is going to happen anyway. Whether they come with the teams or go to AJ's on a Thursday night they will get drunk. This is a controlled environment," said women's rugby captain Kendra Court. "Queen's is very lucky that, yes, everyone has a good time, but we don't take this to a degrading level."

It is the question of safety that seems to be the most contentious between administration and athletes, with the athletic department claiming to be most concerned about personal injury and the captains claiming that the administration is most concerned with school image.

"We could have totally ignored this, but there were cases of personal injury and this caused concern," said McFarlane, who admitted that he is also concerned with the way Queen's athletes are perceived.

"I don't think it is fair that they come down on us for the safety issues, when we are taking all the precautions. We pair rookies with a sober veteran who look after them all night," said Court. "[The residences] overreact and call detox and 911, when these people just need water and to go to bed."

Anne Benedetti, captain of the women's lacrosse team, saw the meeting in a much more positive light. "I think that to have captains organize other captains is good to get different viewpoints. Each team does things differently," said Benedetti, an IAC member. "Things are still positive surrounding the issues. This was a proactive meeting."

"[The meeting] was very effective in getting things on the table, but not in getting solutions," said McGill. "The whole process was a good first step, but it should not be the be all and end all of the discussion."

McFarlane sees this meeting as a building block as well. He foresees more meetings on this issue in the future in hopes of building an agreeable policy on punishment. The athletic director also sees these meetings as an opportunity to educate captains on not only conduct, but on issues of alcohol.

"We are just asking them to follow the articles in the rules and regulations outlined in the new Interuniversity Student-Athlete Handbook," said McFarlane. "Some rookies fear these nights but I hope the captains will deal with this in a positive way."

"The potential for peer pressure that is involved in sports is much higher than it is at regular orientation events," said former Queen's basketball captain Ian Brisbin.

"[The heavy drinking] is going to happen anyway. Whether they come with the teams or go to AJ's on a Thursday night they will get drunk. This is a controlled environment."

— Kendra Court, women's rugby

"You don't want to scare [the rookies] off," said Court. "If you do, there goes your depth for next year."

With these issues still unresolved, it will be how the subsequent meetings play out that will decide how Queen's athletics will deal with this controversial issue.

"It is not our jurisdiction to say no to rookie parties or no to drinking at rookie parties, nor do we want it to be," said McFarlane. "We are trying to help, that is what we are trying to do."

The eye of the storm

Ian Revell's presentation Iced World brings back chilly memories

Frozen Art: Pieces of Revell's work ice up the walls of the Towne Crier.

ART REVIEW

By JENNIFER HOWSE

Ice Storm. For those of you who braved Kingston last January, those two words may evoke memories of pretty glass-covered trees, dangling power lines, and branches falling through windshields. You may have t-shirts that proclaim "I survived Ice Storm '98!" or the commemorative china plates. Some of you would rather pull out your own arms before you hear those two words together again. Whatever your attitude is on the Ice Storm, forget it for now, because Ian Revell's photography show entitled "Iced World," displayed at the Towne Crier, has nothing to do with it. That's right. Revell corrected me when I asked if his pieces were created during the ice storm. Although the photographs were taken then, the creation of the art spans from last May until very recently. There is an important distinction to make in order to understand his work — it is not just photography, it is art created from photography.

My initial reaction to these pieces was how much they reminded me of those kaleidoscope tubes I had as a child. There is something soothing and captivating about them.

Revell uses single black and white photographs of ice-covered tree branches and rotates the image across different axes to create an entirely new design.

thing new. One piece entitled "nexus" resembles a stained-glass window, and another, entitled "tangled," evokes a patch of lace or a spider's web. A series of three seemingly separate pieces are actually different arrangements composed from the same image.

A graduate of Queen's Music, Revell admitted to having no formal art training. He does not own an expensive camera, nor does he use fancy lenses. He assembles uncomplicated, close-up shots to make something quite beautiful and serene, drawing your eye into a picture that is at the same time simple and complex. First, you see the basic pattern of the design. Looking closer, you see the interconnection of the lines, and finally, the details, such as crab apples or knots covered in ice. It is a reflection of Revell's desire to create something that is both "of reality and beyond reality."

His work has been shown in Toronto's Little Gallery and locally at the Modern Fuel Gallery. Presently, he is being shown at the Laundry Café, and at the Towne Crier through December.

Pearl Jam
Live on Two Legs
Epic Records

By JIM WHITTINGTON

It seems odd that a band which pretty much ignores every aspect of the commercial music scene could grow to become one of the largest and most successful live acts today, but that is exactly what Pearl Jam has done.

Think about it — their recent video for "Do the Evolution" is their first since Ten in 1991, and they consistently refuse to do any live interviews outside of those for their own pirate radio station. Yet their popularity has soared higher with every new album despite criticism of their ever-softening sound.

Live on Two Legs offers fans the chance to hear one of the world's most exceptional live acts without battling Ticketmaster hotlines, or greedy scalpers. Now this isn't to say that this album captures the true live Pearl Jam experience — only being there could do that — but it's a good album and a real indication of why they are such a huge concert attraction.

The set is rather predictable, with no real surprises outside of a good cover of Neil Young's "Fuck 'n Up." The rest is what you'd expect to hear at a Pearl Jam concert. There's a good mix of old and new material, and that usual "Daughter" jam session, which on this occasion included reuses of "Rock 'n in the Free World" and "W.M.A." Other highlights include excellent versions of "Corduroy," "Off He Goes," and "Untitled."

My only problem with Live on Two Legs is that they didn't play a couple of songs I really wanted to hear in "Alive" and "Immortality," but that's the usual problem of putting out a live album — you're bound to disappoint some people.

It may be no substitute for the real thing, but Live on Two Legs does a hell of a job of capturing one of the world's best live acts for posterity.

This is one great live disc.

Brian Taguchi
Fuselage
Normal Guy Records

By JACKIE MCLACHLAN

In light of his previous musical efforts with the group Clever Hans, I anticipated Brian Taguchi's solo album, Fuselage, to be something great. I soon realized this to be a serious understatement; Fuselage is excellent. While the musical content is impressive, the actual process that was used to make the album is equally remarkable, not to mention unique.

Considering that Fuselage is an independent effort, completely recorded and mixed on an 8-track machine, the finished product is extremely impressive.

One of the most inspiring aspects of Taguchi's album is the dedication and individuality within it. It is apparent that Taguchi's priority is to create music that marks a place, time, or event in his life in such a way as to allow others to become involved in, and appreciate, his experiences.

Unlike some other musicians, Taguchi doesn't compromise personality for mainstream, empty and generic drivel; the type that is all too common on most radio stations. Fuselage is a collection of 11 songs, each of which has a distinct sound, yet lends an overall alternative, acoustic edge to the album. The depth of the album can be seen both in pieces such as "John" and "Ideas of Dobbin" that were written more than two years ago, and in songs like "Throw Me a Bone" and "Sweet Like Candy" that were literally finished during the October recording session. "Rust" and "Beam" are representative of the vocal harmony and multi-layering instrumental effect that underlies the album.

There's no question that Brian Taguchi is extremely talented. Fuselage is an amazing, instantly likeable debut solo effort, that exhibits the care and time invested in it. If Fuselage is any indication of subsequent albums, the outlook is extremely good for Mr. Taguchi.

The Beautiful South
Quench
Mercury Records

By SARAH CROSSIE

I fell in love with them because of a pencilcase in the late eighties with everyone else. Ten years ago, the Beautiful South released Welcome to the Beautiful South and with it their most famous song, "Song for Whomever" which features the line, "I love you from the bottom of my pencilcase."

Now a decade later they've released a new album which will surely Quench their fans' longing for the group's silly, yet realistic songs.

Quench features 13 new tracks ranging from, melodic ballads such as "Pockets," to sensual, jazzy tunes like "Losing Things"

Canadian folk and rock outfit charge their way into Kingston

CONCERT REVIEW

By Sarah Lidstone

Most people know of the Rheostatics from their frequent tours with the Tragically Hip who, despite numerous rumours, did not show up at AJ's on Wednesday night to jam with their old touring buddies.

Static Electricity: Rheostatics in action at AJ's on Wednesday.

I went to this concert with only a vague familiarity of the Rheostatics' older material, and was surprised that I still recognized their unique style. You could describe them as a very technical band — although loud — and very Canadian.

changes in tempo which are so characteristic of the Rheostatics' style. In "Fish Tank," the band seemed to tease the crowd as they bounced back and forth between heavy rock verses and smooth, whispering choruses.

The band could be described as musical artists on the abstract side, experimenting with all aspects of sound. They use their instruments to their full capacity, blending finger picking at a comfortable pace with loud, echoing distortion. The music took on an surreal quality, sometimes floating dreamily, sometimes rooted in heavy rock, and often a combination of the two.

The band is unconventional in the way that they refrain from using the popular verse-chorus-verse structure in their songs. The music was unpredictable, and I found myself captivated by it. The songs were carefully constructed by very talented, veteran musicians who created an innovative sound unlike any other I have ever heard.

The vocals seemed to play a secondary role to the music. All four band members participated in the vocals, either harmonizing or singing the echoing backup vocals. The lead guitarist's distinctive voice floated over the music, and he sang with an energetic intensity that blended perfectly with the sound. A guest singer, Sarah Harper, sang a beautiful version of "Harmolonia," one of the band's latest songs, commanding the stage with gentle confidence.

The opening band, The Colour Teenies, also deserve some mention. They got down to business as soon as they hit the stage, playing a solid set of 12 songs in about an hour. It's the kind of music I'd play while getting ready to throw a party; good guitars, great melodies, and a full, pulsing sound.

In two hours, The Rheostatics put on a very dynamic show, playing off each other from song to song with a level of comfort only present in experienced bands. However, I didn't even have to see the show to enjoy it; hearing it was enough to make it a great concert.

Bad as it wants to be
New Christian Slater flick is dark, chaotic and enjoyable

Very Bad Things
Cataqui Cinema

By Lilian Kim

Picture this: Take the most annoying sound audible to the human ear and elevate it by a million decibals. Potential for losing your mind? Not quite. But let's add in a few other ingredients like a perfectionist, a prick and a few dead bodies. Pretty potent stuff for a weak heart.

Realistically though, how could all of these things come together without being really stupid or extremely agitating? The solution to these problems: Do something very bad.

But like anything, the wedding is only a decoy to the true fire behind getting hitched: the bachelor party.

Contrary to the title, Very Bad Things is actually quite good, very good as a matter of fact. Chicago Hope's Peter Berg wrote and directed this dark, sharp comedy based around a couple's wedding. The wedding is only a decoy to the true fire behind getting hitched: the bachelor party.

The deliciously talented Jon Favreau takes on the role of Kyle Fisher, an over-worked stockbroker who finds time away from his overbearing, perfectionist bride Laura (Cameron Diaz) to pile into the infamous white mini-van with four of his closest friends for a road trip to Las Vegas.

With an incredibly strong and versatile cast, the story only becomes stronger. The dialogue is smart and witty, often humble with philosophy.

The five gentlemen, who consist of Boyd (a snarky Christian Slater), Adam (Daniel Stern), Michael (Jeremy Piven), the shy Moore (Leland Orser) and Kyle are going to get a little high, watch some sports and have some good old fashioned fun. What they are left with is an accidentally murdered stripper/prostitute and a very murdered hotel security guard. They opt-out of informing the police and decide to cover their tracks. This only begins a string of guilty feelings and more deaths.

The annoying part, which is possibly the most effective aspect, is the constant chaos that is portrayed in the film.

As exams quickly approach, the traffic at Stauffer will be getting more chaotic and frenzied. For those feeling stressed, it would be worthwhile to drop those books and head down to the Union Gallery for a short break. Four fourth-year Fine Arts students, Daphne Locke, Marc (no last name), Sarah Hatton and Diane Southall, are currently showing a provocative exhibit entitled "extra muros."

Altering images from postcards from her relatives in England, she succeeds in suggesting what it was like in the past by clouding images to show the passing of time.

Although each of these artists has a clearly different style and mission, their work seems to mesh together in the gallery creating an interesting, yet challenging result. The pieces include paintings, box sculpture, quilts, plexiglass installation and video. While at first glance, the room appears intimidating with its complexity, each work is strong enough to hold its own amongst the surrounding distractions.

Locke, provides the strong sculptural component of the show. Her work "Crush Box" was not only interesting aesthetically, but also struck me as extra muros is bowling over audiences and critics at Union Gallery.

to upbeat pop ditties like "How Long's A Tear Take To Dry?" — the first song on the CD and surely to get you hooked.

The Beautiful South's sound is unique and unlike any other group, because of the vocals of Paul Heaton, Dave Hemingway, and Jacqueline Abbott. Heaton and Hemingway's voices are strong and distinctive in their tone. Although they are similar, which allows them to create incredible harmonies, their sound is unlike any other male vocalists that I've heard.

Abbott, the female vocalist of the group doesn't compliment the male vocals, but rather, accentuates the group's overall clean and simplistic sound.

To compliment the vocals, the lyrics are modest, to say the least; most often rhyming in an elementary school fashion, yet never abandoning the strong message of the song.

Genreless, Quench is a great new album, suitable for any occasion. I strongly recommend this holiday season, you take a trip down South.

ple chord progression and perhaps due to the short period that the band has been together, the music still exudes an expected rawness. There is potential here, and perhaps, with time, the band will realize it.

Life-Size
Slippery Songs Inc.

By ANNA NESBITT

The Cosmos started the band almost by accident. Lead singer and guitarist Tyson Champagne was having a jam session with Sean McKenty, the band's drummer, when they decided to hook up with guitarist Sean Rouleau. From there they evolved to what you know of them: an energetic, music loving, Kingston band. Despite the commendable number of shows this group has performed, if they want to be a well known, quality band, they're going to need to continually evolve.

Between tracks one and six on their debut CD Life-Size, I could barely distinguish one song from the next. The only part of the CD that possessed any originality was the lyrics. The chords and tunes tended to blend in with the preceding song. I often found myself forwarding through bits of the songs and even skipping them at times. However, track eight, "Life in the Food Chain," although a typical attempt at nineties garage rock, caught my attention due to its contrast with the slower, more melodic tracks on the album. Unfortunately after two minutes and 44 seconds of repetitive and monotonous vocal slamming, I lost all enthusiasm I momentarily had.

The Cosmos do make some good attempts to create personality by experimenting with styles from all over the musical spectrum. However, with sim-

"If this record dropped out of the sky by a three-piece band that nobody had heard of, people would be in the street shouting at the top of their lungs, naked, about it" — Michael Stipe, on REM's latest release, Up.

Significant truth lies behind Stipe's rather conceited comment. REM's glory days lie behind them, but what remains of the most well-known University of Georgia band (percussionist Bill Berry left the group prior to the recording of Up, due in part to recent ill-health. "He's making hay," reports Stipe.) is accomplishing that rarest of rock and roll feats — REM is aging with dignity.

Instead of reducing the group to a musical chair soap opera a la Van Halen, REM opted not to replace Berry per se, but instead decided to forge ahead sans percussion. While some of the tracks employ the ever-unpopular drum machine, some of the album's most memorable moments occur on those tracks unadorned by a drummer of any sort.

It is not a totally new REM that inhabits Up; in fact, the new release is entirely consistent with their many previous efforts. Some of the automated percussion sounds so reminiscent of Berry's stylings that it seems as if the machine is haunted by his ghost. But, like the title implies, Up is a new direction for REM, if not much of a departure. Stipe revisits familiar themes, his vocals are their usual distinctive, Southern Nasal selves and guitarist Peter Buck still appears to live in mortal fear of a lengthy solo.

From the almost corny ("Daysleeper," in the not-so-proud REM tradition of sunny pop that also produced "Shiny Happy People" and "Stand") to the sublime ("Diminished," "Falls to Climb"), Up is a strong and vital collection, a far more complete and satisfying release than their previous effort, the pseudo-live and inconsistent New Adventures in Hi-Fi (1996).

A moment on Up says it all: the tiny, affecting "I'm not over you." It may be the post-Berry era and REM may be on its last legs, but we're not over them yet. And, if you can excuse the terrible pun, things are looking Up.

Happy Holidays from your friends in A&E. P.S. Santa Claus is female! Road!

No more Tinsel? Ellen DeGeneres and Anne Heche believe that Hollywood, a.k.a. Tinseltown, has turned against them. The popular couple have fired their agents and publicists and may re-locate to San Francisco. DeGeneres next stars in three new films, including Goodbye Lover, while Heche will be starring in Psycho.

Happy Holidays from St. Dick: Dennis Rodman filed papers last Monday, seeking an annulment from his marriage to Carmen Elektra. The two exchanged vows on November 14 in Las Vegas, but Rodman's lawyer said his client was, "so inebriated at the nuptials that he didn't know which way was up."

Can't Hardly Wait to Spread the Love: Jennifer Love Hewitt and Tony Danza turned out to serve meals to the hungry and homeless at a Los Angeles mission. Love Hewitt, said, "I just served mashed potatoes. It makes me feel good."

Season of Cher-ing: For three decades, Cher has maintained a successful career. Just in time for the holidays, the superstar female has released a new CD, Believe and just released a book, For the First Time — not to mention that she will also sing the national anthem at the Super Bowl in 1999.

emotional involvement and observational detachment.

The work of Hattori is inspired from childhood memories from her early home in England. Hattori finds a sense of reassurance, and shows us this in her paintings. Her work has a strong affiliation with photography in its usage of glossy paint. Altering images from postcards from her relatives in England, she succeeds in suggesting what it was like in the past by clouding images to show the passing of time.

The final artist in this group exhibition appears to be the most traditional. Southall uses colours. Both her painting and quilting are valid and valuable to the success of the show.

The different styles of the artists all compliment each other. "extra muros" has something for everyone, no matter what your taste happens to be. Without guessing at a profound meaning to its arrangement, all the work suggests a sense of acceptance of art on many different levels.

The subjects of her paintings are recognizable and reinforce her love for craft as art.

As a study break, try wandering amongst these pieces — you'll end up thinking more than you would staring at a textbook.

A&E would like to wish everyone a very safe and happy holiday season. Hope to see you in the New Year!

MISC.'s quickie guide to Breaking The Study Habit

I have always advocated the need for good study habits, not only because I value the importance of learning, but because I always seem to try too hard to impress girls. In fact, it is usually shortly after this advocacy of good study habits that I begin dropping the names of famous authors I've read, casually flexing my biceps and posturing coquettishly. It's a problem I've always had, but my psychiatrist tells me I'm making a lot of progress. I'm taking her to a Noam Chomsky reading this Thursday, then maybe coffee and who knows.

The point is this: in a few weeks, you're going to have to put a shocking amount of useless facts into your head for a very short time, write them down on paper, then forget everything and never think about it again. This is important. The last thing you want to focus on at this stage is reclaiming knowledge in any way. No, at this point in time I'd recommend watching a few movies, taking up a form of interpretive dance, something like that. You're not going to want to open your books until a day or two before your exam. That way, you're really exercising your short term memory, while at the same time insuring you won't learn a single damn thing in the long run of things. That's rule number one, by the way. Here, I'll put it in bold type - this kind of technique always tends to make points look more impressive.

RULE #1: Never learn anything.

Just memorize it by rote, then forget about it and go play some field hockey or something.

While I've got the "bold" window out on my word processor, I'll outline rule number two.

RULE #2: Always bolden your points and then centre them on the page. This never fails to make them look really important.

Another thing to remember about studying is that you should use this time to go to the bank and get a lot of crisp new five dollar bills. Keep them sealed in a plastic baggy. When you have to go write an exam, take the baggy, along with one (1) small portable stapler, and of course a couple of pens. As you write the exam, staple fives to each page as you go.

The last page you should staple completely with fives. Under the fives, write a short but heartfelt verse of poetry to your professor, outlining briefly your admiration, respect and quiet awe for their mental faculties, and yes, even their rock-solid yet giving Greek-like forms. Focus on the buttocks, and how chiseled they are.

RULE #3: Make sure the fives are crisp. Focus on chiseled buttocks.

What sort of music do you listen to? Your choice can be important when studying. Scientists in white lab coats have proven that different types of music can stimulate the brain differently.

Classical music, for instance, stimulates different facets of the brain all at once, due to the interplay of melodies in different octaves. Conversely, the music of Courtney Love stimulates the brain not at all, and is not good for studying. The music of Courtney Love is excellent for skeet shooting though, so go figure.

It has been established that, amongst the masters of Classical composing, it is probably Mozart who will best stimulate your brain. Why Mozart's music stimulates the brain so well is unclear—however, we know that Mozart always used to hum to himself during quizzes, and his results were nothing short of spectacular. The facts are clear; pump the Mozart and soar to victory.

RULE #4: Courtney Love is good for skeet shooting. Mozart hums to himself.

Lastly, you might find it in your best interests to start attending classes. Often you will discover that the prof will take the time to lay out the form of the exam. Naturally, your professor will not actually tell you the answers to the exam, nor will they blatantly map out every last insignificant aspect of it. Of course, this never stops everyone in the class from asking pestering and intrusive questions anyway. Join in with these slack-jawed incompetents! If you're lucky, the prof might let something important slip. If you're luckier, the prof will simply take one look at you and your classmates and write off the exam altogether as a lost cause.

RULE #5: Your classmates cannot think independently. Do likewise and reap the many benefits.

Good luck in this upcoming month, young student, the month of reckoning for your future success. And remember, what are marks but mere jots of ink on paper that completely define the outcome of your future professional life? What are exams but a test to see if you've learned anything? And what is university but an excuse to have sex as often as possible? Which, my psychiatrist tells me, I'm making a lot of progress on.

James Pinkerton wants all the answers for Christmas.

The editors' reflections on violence against women

I WAKE UP IN A COLD SWEAT. He was chasing me again. Through the streets of the ghetto which are unusually silent. There's no one around to help me, or to hear my screams — if I can even get them out. I hold my keys tightly clenched between my fingers — like they taught me in self-defense. "Could I really do anything with these?" I ask myself as I run toward the lights of the JDUC. Just as I feel his strong, cold hand on my arm, something jolts me awake. I am left sitting in bed with all the lights on; unable to fall asleep again for hours sometimes.

This recurring dream has invaded my thoughts since I entered university four years ago. I have lived in Toronto my whole life and have never been afraid to walk alone or take the subway by myself at night, until recently.

I am left sitting in bed with all the lights on; unable to fall asleep again for hours sometimes.

I was followed home from school at the age of 13, I saw a man masturbating in a van while watching me walk down the street when I was 14 and a man exposed himself to me on the subway when I was 15. In the span of three years, I learned the harsh realities of the dark side of male sexuality. These events, however, did not drastically change my life. I hadn't even thought about them until I sat down to write this editorial. More than anything, these occurrences made me angry. Why did these men feel they had the right to make me feel threatened and vulnerable? I wanted to prove them wrong. I wasn't scared of anything.

Then I entered university, bad some terrifying experiences with men, heard my friends' male horror stories and read about assaults on campus. Ever since, I have been paranoid about everything to do with being alone in a situation where men can take advantage of me.

It seems I'm the only one of my friends who thinks this is a big deal. None of them feel the need to find a walk home from the Shot, none of them are frightened of walking through parks alone at night. Maybe my over-cautiousness is unwarranted?

Then I remember the 14 women who were murdered on December 6, 1989.

Would they have been more cautious of walking alone had they survived that awful day? You can't be prepared for every situation that might arise, but you lose every battle you don't fight.

The more I think about it, the less embarrassed I feel about being so cautious. I mean, my mother's motto has always been, "it's better to be safe than sorry."

Why bother risking my own safety for the sake of feeling powerful? I can fight the never-ending battle of the sexes in other, less potentially harmful ways.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN to have a broken heart?

I think I can answer, for mine is broken beyond imagining. It is looking at the face of one you love like a sister, like you love yourself, and you that she has been raped or beaten by her boyfriend, breaking the body he said he loved.

And she is trying to imagine how this can be, how to fit this unexpected victimhood into her strong self. This has happened so many times, this is always happening, this is what it is to be female — here and now.

I would like to tell myself that this isn't true. I would like to believe that I could reach up and shatter the glass ceiling with the slightest touch of my fingers, and it would lie broken at my feet. And I would like to believe that the bad guys will always get caught. And that I will be able to figure out who the bad guys are.

There is a film about the Montreal Massacre. The camera wanders down a line of people, pausing to observe an elderly couple who are standing, waiting to see the row of dark coffins in Notre Dame Basilica. A reporter asks them, is this incident reflective of society as a whole, is this an example of what it is like?

"Yes", the woman says, "it is." The man cannot believe it — he objects loudly and vehemently to her assertion. If this were not an isolated incident, he insists, we would be in a war. Here was but one lonely madman... it is a tragic event but nothing more.

But oh my sweet innocent sir, we are in a war. The casualties are legion but they die so quietly that you will never miss them. It is secret and hidden, for there are only civilian casualties and the battlefield is always disguised as an office or a bedroom — where the TV cameras never go. The evidence is hidden by the soldiers and their victims, and the scars are only visible to those who have eyes to see.

This is what it is to be female — here and now.

Violence against women did not begin when Marc Lepine walked into école Polytechnique armed with hatred and a gun, and it did not end when he killed himself at the end. Oh no, it is all around — hidden in the bruises that weren't accidents and tears and silence. Still and always violence continues, quietly and privately, and people seem to want to forget that there was a moment when everyone was looking, and wondering why. I ask myself how long until the 14 women who were murdered nine years ago are as forgotten as all the rest.

Out of respect for the dead and love for the living, I will remember.

Remembering the Massacre

By ELIZABETH FROGG

Wednesday, December 6, 1989, 4:30 p.m. It's the last day of classes at École Polytechnique, finals will begin tomorrow. The school is packed with students attending their last lectures and studying for exams.

Around 5 p.m. Marc Lepine enters École Polytechnique and shoots Maryse Laganière in the hallway outside the finance department. He then makes his way to a second-floor classroom, where a class on heat transfer is in progress. When he bursts in to the room, he orders the men to leave. No one moves. They're sure it's a prank. He fires a few shots and as the men leave the room, he kills six of the women in the class and injures others.

It's 5:17 p.m. and bells are ringing to evacuate the school. The Montreal police receive the first 911 call from Polytechnique. They're on the scene within minutes, but no one knows what's happened, how many gunmen there are, who's been shot, where the assailant/assailants are.

Marc Lepine goes to Polytechnique's cafeteria. He opens fire and kills three women, injures several other women and men.

Then he goes up to the third floor. In room 311 three students are presenting their final project to the other 23 in the class. Marc Lepine bursts in and stomps across the desks as students cower on the floor. He shoots and kills three women, injuring others. He then stabs Maryse Leclair to death and shoots himself. There is still ammunition left in the gun.

At 5:45 p.m. paramedics enter the building. Still, no one knows if there is another gunman, or who is inside, but they have waited long enough. By 6 p.m. ambulances are taking the wounded to nearby hospitals. A temporary morgue is set up in the school as police begin trying to identify the dead.

It is hard to know exactly what happened in the fear and confusion, and it is impossible to know all the reasons why. All that can be told for sure is that by 6 p.m. on December 6, 1989, 14 women were dead, and nine other women and four men were wounded. It is one of the worst massacres in Canadian history.

GENEVIÈVE BERGERON, 21, was a second-year scholarship student in civil engineering. Her mother, Montreal city councillor Thérèse Daviau, was at a council meeting when she heard about the massacre. She sent a friend to tell her he'd identified Geneviève's body.

HÉLÈNE COLGAN, 23, was in her final year of mechanical engineering and planned to take her master's degree. Her parents were watching news of the massacre on TV when they realized she had been in the classroom stormed by Marc Lepine.

NATHALIE CROTEAU, 23, was in her final year of mechanical engineering. Her father, Fernand Croteau, was one of the first people to arrive at Polytechnique after the Massacre became known. He was anxious about his daughter, and arrived to find he had to identify her body.

BARBARA DAIGNEAULT, 22, was in her final year of mechanical engineering. Her father Pierre was a mechanical engineering professor at Université du Québec nearby. Barbara helped him out as a teaching assistant in his classes there.

ANNE-MARIE EDWARD, 21, was a first-year chemical engineering student. Her family was very close; they could not bring themselves to speak to the media. Her mother has become involved in lobbying for gun control since her death.

MAUD HAVERNICK, 29, was a second-year student in engineering materials, a branch of metallurgy, and a graduate in environmental design. She and her friend Michèle were giving their final presentation on a metals project they'd worked on all semester.

MICHELE RICHARD, 21, was a second-year student in engineering materials. She and Maud were standing together at the front of their classroom when Marc Lepine burst in.

BARBARA MARIA KLUENZNIK, 31, was a first-year nursing student at Université de Montréal. She and her husband, Witold Widajewicz, had immigrated to Canada from Poland two years earlier in search of a better life, and were having dinner in the Polytechnique's cafeteria when she was killed.

MARYSE LAGANIÈRE worked in the finance department of Polytechnique. She and her husband, Jean-François Larivée, had been married in August.

MARYSE LECLAIR, 22, was a fourth-year engineering materials student. Her father Pierre Leclair, head of public relations for the MUC police, arrived at the Polytechnique and addressed the media outside before going in and finding his daughter dead on the floor.

ANNE-MARIE LEMAY, 27, was a fourth year student in mechanical engineering. Her funeral was held privately, away from the group funeral of many of the other women, in the church where she'd sung in the choir.

SONIA PELLETIER, 28, was to graduate on December 7, 1989 with a degree in mechanical engineering. She was awarded a degree posthumously. She was the baby of her family, leaving seven older brothers and sisters.

ANNE-ST-ARNEAULT, 23, was a mechanical engineering student attending her last lecture before graduation. She was an excellent student and an athlete.

ANNE TURCOTTE, 21, was a first-year engineering materials student who hoped to work in environmental engineering. She lived in downtown Montreal with her brother, Christian.

Sore ankles and wounding words

By LILIAN KIM

Michael Hudak kicked me in the ankle in the fourth grade. It hurt like hell, so I punched him. It was an honest attempt; 50 pounds of girl punching with all her heart. I tried as hard as I could to express my true feelings toward him at that moment.

We were fighting over something I can't recall right now, but it was intense, as intense as nine year olds could possibly get. As he held his arm and I caressed my ankle, our beloved teacher, Mrs. Wolowicz, appeared from virtually nowhere and stood between us.

She told me to take a seat while she began explaining to Mike the dos and don'ts of gentleman etiquette. She told him that it wasn't appropriate for gentlemen to hit girls. She explained to him that real men handle things differently. Mike didn't like that.

"She punched me!" he offered in a teary voice.

She understood and continued to tell him about the niceties of human behaviour. I sat watching this whole discussion, thinking that this was easier than I ever thought it would be. I was going to get off on this one easier than I had expected.

But then our beloved Mrs. Wolowicz turned herself around and gave me the exact same speech. She told me that girls don't hit — period. I pouted for a second and ignored the rest. Living with two older brothers and being the only female in the family other than my mom, I had my share of headlocks, mercy fights and WWF wrestling sessions. I was always encouraged to fight back, or at least try, so when I was told that I should have been passive during that whole ordeal with Mike, it didn't go over too well.

It's really not about the violence. I'm not advocating violence and saying that we should all participate in a hitting rampage. Discretion, maturity and plain humanity come into effect.

But when one sex is told not to fight back because of society expects demureness, it becomes ridiculous. It sets a certain hierarchy for the standards, morals, ethics — whatever they call it — to simply explain that things are definitely not equal between the two sexes. When we say 'assault' or 'abuse,' the first thing that comes to mind is that a woman is a victim.

This past summer made me, and many other people, realize how much society's perception of violence relies on perceptions of gender.

The heat of the summer enveloped the city of Toronto with lazy evenings and late night television. It was pretty calm, nothing really exciting happened to distract the city people from their summer jobs or vacations.

Then, one night the media went into a frenzy. A Metro police officer had been killed on duty. Detective John Hancock was stabbed during his routine patrol. Everyone hoped that they would find the guys who did this to him.

What no one expected was the arrest of two women.

People couldn't believe it. The news caused a shift that strangled both the city and the media in an unfathomable typhoon. There was analysis and discussion left, right and centre. Women murdering an officer — it just didn't seem normal.

Sometimes it is the state of mind that is the real criminal. The fatal tragedy that occurred on December 6 in Montreal was primarily based on what someone had thought; it was an inherent belief Marc Lepine possessed. In this case, he felt denied an opportunity. Lepine took a specific characteristic from those he believed to be "the enemy" and made it into a fault he felt was unforgivable.

Unfortunately, not everyone involved that day had a choice. For a few moments, a group of innocent people had no choice but to accept someone else's opinion. Some of those people died because of the opinion forced on them.

Words can sometimes create wounds, but the mind houses the ultimate conclusion. What can we do about it? I'm sorry, I don't know. I think most of the time we wish that something would happen that could fix everything. Wouldn't it be nice if everyone came to the sudden realization that violence could be eliminated indefinitely if we just tried.

Maybe one day there won't be any more swollen ankles, sore arms or broken hearts. But bandages can only last for a certain amount of time before we can recognize that there is something cosmically painful that is happening underneath them.

BY MEGHAN PALMER

"Why can't you trust me?" "Why can't you just be more open?" "What are you afraid of?" Past boyfriends have asked me these questions time and time again. They can be answered by a lot of people in many different ways, but for me the answer is simple. I'm afraid of men. They're intimidating, they're strong and they want you to love them — fully and completely. I don't know if I ever can.

My past leaves a lot to be desired when it comes to men. I've been jumped and threatened, I've had my house broken into by a guy I knew at school and I've been followed and harassed. I even know a sergeant at the local precinct who deals with my case exclusively.

I don't tell a lot of people that every year for seven years a former classmate has done something to me. For instance, he broke into my car, broke into my house when I was home alone and he wrote a will leaving everything to me. You could say I've had some bad luck.

Needless to say, I'm not just intimidated by men; I'm nervous and terrified of them. It's too bad, and I try to pretend it's okay. But all of my friends know that I don't ever let myself get too close to men. I wish I could, but I can't.

I'm not going to say it's all because of my past, but why not? Have you ever showered with a butcher knife because you're scared someone's coming to rape you? Have you ever heard a noise in your house and fallen to the floor crying because you think this is the time you're not going to get away? Have you ever gone to your car only to find it's been broken into because this guy you know told the police he wanted to be closer to you by listening to your music and taking your shirt? I have.

So, until you've experienced the absolute terror of sitting in a bathtub naked, wet and cold while some guy you know plays with your head and walks slowly up the stairs after breaking into your home, then you can't judge me. But at the same time I know you can't understand me either.

No Escape - A Cycle of Battery

Scared hopes blur the vision in her right eye today. Wednesday it was broken promises that cast a shadow of bruises on her feeble arms.

She faults her incessant clumsiness for the array of abrasions that splatter her body... but her loved ones know better. Leave him, they plead.

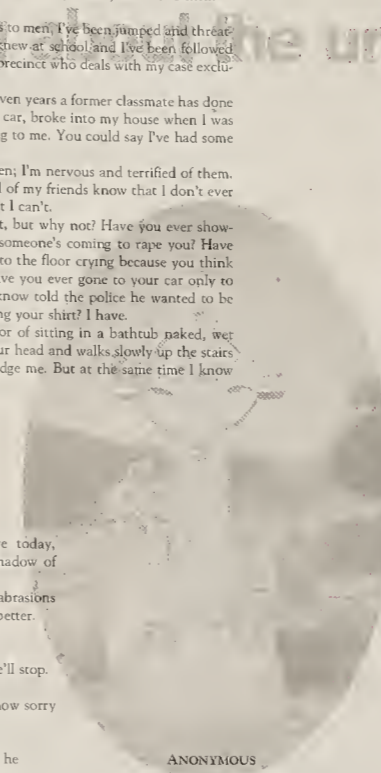

But where will she go? Besides, he loves her. He needs her. He's sorry. He'll stop. But will he?

Of course! They don't know him. They don't see how sorry he is. They don't understand. But he's dangerous.

Maybe he is scary. Maybe he has a temper. Maybe he does hurt me. Maybe he won't stop. But maybe he's all I got.

And maybe Friday will be different.

ANONYMOUS

When I was eight years old I used to lay awake at nights listening to my parents fight. They never stopped, there was screaming, insults, loud noises. I imagined they were aliens, and my real parents would come and take me away.

Then one night after I finally fell asleep, my mom came and woke me up. There was a policeman with her and she made me get dressed before we got my baby brother.

Turns out my dad was angrier than usual and drunk again. He got out the gun, loaded it and went for a drive. She took us away quickly, to somewhere my dad would never look for us, because she was afraid of who he'd come hunting.

BY SHANDLEY MCMURRAY

I went to buy a present on my lunch break one day. As soon as I stepped outside of the mall, a man approached me and called, "Hey sexy." I kept walking. Every woman is used to these humiliating cat calls. "I said 'hey sexy,'" he said in a more aggressive voice as he turned to follow me. I looked all around me. The entire parking lot was empty. There was not one person walking to or from a car. I began to get scared and quickened my pace.

I could hear his footsteps speeding up behind me. I can still hear the loud clumping of his shoes in my mind. Just when my heart stopped beating and my body was on the verge of freezing from fear, a car pulled around the corner and drove slowly down my parking aisle. I don't know what happened to the man who was following me. I couldn't turn back. I just kept racing toward the car.

I finally reached the car after what seemed to me like five minutes, but was probably about 30 seconds. I got in so quickly that I bashed my head as I pulled the door shut. I immediately locked it behind me. I could not stop shaking.

BY JOCELYN LAPORTE

As a young woman, issues central to violence against women always strike close to home. I am one of a fortunate few who have never been the victim of an assault or act of violence. I feel lucky, but I feel afraid.

The current statistics surrounding the abuse and assault of women are startling. I do not want to become one of those statistics — but how can I protect myself against this obvious disease in our society?

Our papers and televisions are filled with daily examples of injustices against women. I know friends, family members and other students who have been the victims of violence. It is real and I am afraid.

My family has provided me with strength, encouragement and ambition throughout my university education, and some days I feel as though I am prepared, even excited, to step out and meet the challenges that face me. But how can anything prepare me for a world filled with uncertainty and fear?

An interval away from violence

Kingston shelter helps women and children take control of their lives

BY SHANDLEY MCMURRAY

When most people hear the word "shelter," they think of decrepit cots with thin, stained sheets and a soup kitchen serving mystery meat. The Kingston Interval House lays all of these stereotypes to rest.

When you first enter the House, a feeling of warmth and friendliness washes over you. It is immaculate and well furnished, with a trendy decor. There are women knitting by the fireplace in the living room and children playing quietly on the floor. You feel at home and safe within the walls of this enormous old house.

According to one of the women's services counselors, the more than 20 year-old shelter's priority "is to women and their children, or just women alone who have come from abusive situations." The trained staff members offer non-judgmental counselling, as well as a safe environment for victims of abuse.

Not everyone can turn up at Interval House's doorstep and expect to be admitted. "Women that come in here must be appropriate and follow the rules," the counselor said. In other words, drinking and abuse are prohibited and everyone must be in by the 1:30 a.m. curfew on weekdays and by 2:30 a.m. on weekends.

Women and children can stay at Interval House for up to two months. According to the counselor, women usually spend the first month getting organized and the second month finding a place to stay.

The counselors have a list of other shelters and self-help organizations to give to those who need help beyond what Interval House can provide. The shelter also offers various support programs for both women and children.

Most of all, the counselor said, "we encourage women to be as independent as they can." The counselors, and other members of the House, don't want women to lean on them for support; instead, they want these former victims to stand on their own. After all, "they're here because they can look after themselves," the counselor said.

There are no maids or cooks at Interval House. Every woman receives a chore when she arrives and is expected to complete her task daily. "They've got to live cooperatively," the counselor stated. Residents help themselves to breakfast and lunch and one of them makes a "chore dinner" at night.

Interval House is funded by the Ministry of Community and Social Services, the United Way of Kingston, the City of Kingston and the Township of Kingston, but it also relies on donations to help women make a new start.

Sarah's story

By SARAH CROSSIE

What constitutes violence against women? A slap across the face? A shove down the stairs? Calling her a bitch? I think they all do, but none of these have ever happened to me. Does that mean I haven't experienced violence? For many years I would have said I haven't.

Before high school I was "going out" with someone older than me. All my friends thought I was lucky to date someone who was not only older, but considered "cool." Like a typical pre-teen, holding hands on the way home from school or getting a late night phone call made me feel special and loved.

My friends and I spent many days and evenings hanging out at his house. He just lived with his mother, and she wasn't home much. One night we were all watching a movie. Honestly, I have no recollection of what it was. With the exception of my best friend, I can't even remember who was there that night.

At one point in the evening, "my boyfriend" grabbed my hand and pulled me off the couch. His bedroom was on the same level as the living room. He led me into his bedroom and we ended up on the bed. The remainder of the evening could have taken ten minutes or three hours; it all seemed like a giant whirlwind. All my memories are blurred together and I only have fragments of sights and sounds left.

I remember that his bed faced the door. He had a sticker of a radio station on his mirror. I think he was wearing a black t-shirt, but then again, my memories are so vague that it could have been white. At first we were just kissing — which was fine. I thought it was romantic and remember thinking how envious my friends in the other room must have been of me.

The next stages of the night are so unclear, but before I could realize what was happening, he had taken his pants off. I know I was scared, but I thought this was natural — he was older, so I believed that he knew what he was doing and I didn't.

I didn't want to seem too young or inexperienced because I was afraid he would dump me. Then, quickly, his underwear was off too. The next thing I remember was having my head shoved into his crotch and I realized that my cheek was pushed against his bare penis. I had never seen a penis before, except when I was a child, and I had no idea what to do or say, so I looked up at him and saw him glaring down at me.

After that, I just remember both his hands holding my head down against his penis, and his fingers pushing into my temples till it felt like my head was bleeding. He was saying over and over again, "Sarah, suck it now. I said now." He held my head there for what seemed like hours until, for some reason, whether it was because I was shaking or because he could hear people outside, he let me go and told me to get out.

I left that night and went home, only to discover the next day that he had told all my friends I had given him head — and they were so proud. To this day, everyone from my old group of friends thinks I did it first. But, ironically, what made me cool in the eyes of my pre-teen friends made me terrified and self-conscious of being intimate with men for years.

That incident occurred more than eight years ago, and until I began writing this article, I had only thought about that night a few times. I realized years later that what happened what abuse. And it was wrong. I was wronged. Why? Because I was a female and less powerful than he because he was older, bigger and stronger.

Everyone needs to think about how they treat anyone they're intimate with. It stays with them forever.

Physical intimidation

By MEGHAN PALMER

The 20th century has brought us computers, women's professional basketball and snowboarding as an Olympic sport. It's a time when society has tried to treat women as equals, information as a powerful force and weapons as a last resort. But how equal are we?

In Kingston specifically, there are huge variances in income, housing and education. These issues are relevant in today's society but I think people are beginning to move away from one of the major issues in this century — equality between the sexes. I think the feminist movement has intimidated as many students as it has enlightened and yet, there are gender issues that must be further examined. For me, the most important issue that needs to be studied relates to the fact that men are physically stronger than women. I don't believe that men understand that they are physically intimidating.

In first year, while walking down Division Street, I was surrounded by five medical students. Not only did they grab my bags and try to lead me to a bar, but when I got away they chased me home and banged on my door until I called security. Those men were obviously attempting to have a good time, but did they have any idea how intimidating they were? These are our future doctors and they chased a first year girl home to her dorm because they thought it was "fun."

I don't understand, I don't pretend to understand and I'm not saying all men use their strength to intimidate women. I just want guys to realize that they can very easily scare a woman. I can understand their desire to have fun, but I can't comprehend why five men would grab grocery bags from a girl and attempt to drag her to a bar. It doesn't make sense to me. What is worse is the fact that this made sense to them. That's what scares me.

war torn

From the secret confrontation chamber in the rank furnace room, that ugly concrete jail cell in the basement, the fierce verbal warfare would seep up through the vents into our dark bedroom at night. We were pretending, trying, praying for sleep to take away the sound. Fury taken beyond the point of reason. The two entwined voices would crescendo and end with a silent, dramatic pause.

Then we'd hear her murmured whisper, and his muffled epilogues, and the tender cereesees meant to take away the sting of the blow. These empty cereesees he gave her, the forgotten promises - lies actually were so much more evil and deadly to us sisters who lay hugging cheek to cheek beneath the coarse blanket. We never talked about it. Only huddled, clinging to each other hoping that it was the last time. For her sake and ours.

Her sunglasses would come out the next day. The kisses would pour from her bruised lips. We never knew who the monster was, or rather, we'd never admit that we knew the grotesque thing that would heat her so many hues of dark purple and sickly blue. But reality punched me in the face the day she was airborne, flying free and nature end angel-like through the gleese coffee table. Sharde of deadly ehraphel hurtling to find relief in my body.

Renée Huang

"You want one?"

Cowboys

It's pretty late and I'm walking home with this guy who I don't even know. His name is Rob though, which is the same as mine. That, and we live in the same direction. It's only the second week into September, but already everything's getting colder. That's probably part of it. It's a twenty-minute walk back and neither of us have jackets, so we're taking it nice and fast. He sticks a cigarette in his mouth and goes to get one for me.

"Nah."

"Missing out — only one road to your lungs, you might as well tar it. Marlboro's too, baby. Fucking American, the best."

Rob talks a lot, which is good because I don't feel like talking much myself. Before this we were at a bar, and before that we were with a bunch of people at this girl's house. I didn't know any of the people too well, but it's September — no one knows anyone too well yet. Some of the girls were pretty hot though. This guy Rob and I have already agreed on that much, there were definitely some hotties. This one girl had breasts like you wouldn't even believe. "Like torpedoes," Rob said and did this motion with his hands, and I agreed with him. Rob's pretty funny now that he's drunk.

"You believe some of those girls?"

"What's that?"

"Some of the stuff they were saying," says Rob.

"Nah."

"You're fucking right, no," says Rob. "My God."

"They were just making up most of those things they did," I tell him. "Showing off and stuff."

"I don't know about girls like that," he says, "girls who act all bad. Just a heap of fucking liars, you ask me — all of them."

Rob's been drinking all night, but he has a point. See, the thing is before we went to the bar, like I said, we were at this girl's house. Just a bunch of people we met this week — nobody really knew anybody. Anyway, we're at her house playing this game, a drinking game, the kind that's supposed to make you get to know people, I guess. It's called "I Never" or something like that. You probably know which one I mean. It's when one person says something that they've never done (or maybe they have) and then everyone else who has done that thing has to take a drink. Basically you just get to hear about the stupid things everybody's done.

It's a pretty idiotic game, if you ask my opinion. And of course it's all bad stuff: who's stolen money from their parents, who's laughed at a retarded kid, blah blah blah. No one ever asks if you've done anything really cool or honest and noble or anything. Mostly people just talked about different places and ways of having sex. Especially the girls.

"Bunch of lying sluts," says Rob. It's cold, but he's still sweating a whole lot. "As if they all did any of that." He's walking a bit ahead of me; I'm having to go pretty fast just to keep up. I look at my watch: 2:23 a.m. My watch is the best. My brother gave it to me when I left to come here. I'm still not used to it, either.

Put it on, loosen it, tighten it, press the buttons. Cool. "They're fucked in the head," Rob says to me, flicking his cigarette butt into the street. "I don't care which lame-ass private school any of them went to. Someone should do something to them. Give them a real story to tell."

Most of the people at the party were girls. Girls the same age as me and Rob, only these girls have done supposedly everything. It's that stupid game. It's bothering Rob a lot, but it's hothering me too. What happened is someone would say something like "I never... had sex in my parents' bed," and all the girls would take a drink. And that's just how it started. Pretty soon it was: "I've never done it in an elevator," or "I never did it with a total stranger," or, "I've never done it in the hall after school," and most of the girls are still taking drinks. Not only that, but they're all "yeah, I know what you mean" about it too. Just as if they'd all done all that stuff. Just as if it was normal.

I've never actually 'done it.' I don't care either. That's not the point. I'm not embarrassed about it or anything. Rob hasn't either.

I asked him and he's the same as me. Honestly, I haven't done much that people would consider 'bad,' anyways. Not that I can't, I just haven't. The point is we don't get all insecure and have to lie about it when we're at some party. Him and me don't pretend as if we've done stuff we haven't done.

"They're probably just insecure," I tell Rob. "Everybody's new here." It's true.

"Insecure my ass," Rob says. "Just because some slut's insecure, it doesn't take two and two to put together, I mean — Well, what's the point of the game if everyone's gonna lie?"

"Yeah."

"It's pointless."

We're almost home. It's a good thing too, because it's really getting cold. I forgot to bring my jacket when I moved in. It was so warm then I didn't even think about how chilly it could get later on. I suppose I could've asked to borrow someone else's, I don't know. I'm just not very prepared. My mom said she'd mail it to me this week, anyway.

"Man, I hope we run into those girls right now. I'd kick their ass," Rob says.

"Yeah," I say. We've stopped walking and are just standing where we are because from here he goes one way home and I go another. "Some girls just need the shit knocked out of them every once in a while," Rob says. "Otherwise they think they can just lie to everyone. They think they can just say stuff, make it up, as if it didn't mean anything. Those girls tonight, they just need a good smack — I know it's not the fucking correct thing to say or whatever, but that's what they need."

I nod and Rob keeps talking.

"Like that chick with the breasts—"

"Amanda?" I say.

"Yeah, the one with the breasts — her. I'd kick her ass. Beat her lying face in. See what she'd have to say then. The bitch — you know what I mean? Give her a lesson. Something to remember me by. The cops would find her, all bruised and bloody, lying somewhere, and they'd come to me and ask why I'd done it, and I'd tell 'em: 'She was telling lies, sheriff. She was telling' goddamn lies.' Then I'd ride off. Just like a cowboy, you know? Just like a fucking cowboy." Rob laughs. I can see his teeth. I laugh too.

"Night, Rob," I say.

"Night, Rob," he says back to me and he laughs again. "You're name's the same as me," he says. Then he gets this funny grin on his face.

"Yep," I say.

We punch each other's fists like buddies but I don't look at his eyes. I walk alone the rest of the way to my little room. I open the door and turn on the overhead light. I take off my watch and set it on the dresser for tomorrow morning. I pull the blinds down, then I take off my clothes and get into my pajamas. My bed still isn't made from this morning but I straighten it a bit and get in. I flip the overhead light off. Then I turn it back on. I turn on the reading light above my bed, too. I get out of bed and turn my desk lamp on. I turn all of the lights on, every single one. I stand there bright in the middle of all that light, but I've forgotten what I was going to do. I can't think of it at all. I look around at the walls of my room. I look at my floor. I look at my bed. I look at my sheets. I pick up the pillow and feel it in my hands. I can't imagine what I was possibly going to do next.

Can you help me with something? I think I've got some issues.

I have this thought that passes through my mind every so often — usually whenever I read or hear about an assault. It's a little series of events that plays out in my head: I'm walking alone, late at night I hear a scream, I turn, I see a man grappling with a woman, usually in some dimly-lit pathway. I approach them, grab the man, pull him away. Sometimes I beat the hell out of him. Sometimes I knock him unconscious. Still other times he beats the hell out of me, or pulls a knife or something like that. The outcome varies depending on how I'm feeling.

I want to know why I feel this way. Is it some hero instinct? Is it an inner know where I stand? Am I just, in my own sad way, trying to feel better about my insignificant role in violence against women? I can't think of one solid thing I've ever done to help the cause, assuming I can refer to it as a cause. If you're not part of the solution, you're part of the problem. Well, if all I do is play mini-movies in my head that allay anxieties about my culpability, then I'm no help at all.

I can try to forget all of the dirty, sexist jokes I've ever heard, and I can ignore guys when they tell them. I can avoid pornography. Anything that I've been told perpetuates the notion that women are sexual objects, are conquerable, are meant to be conquered, I can ignore. Is that enough? What more is wanted from me?

Can someone help me with this? I think I've got some issues.

Males and moral responsibility

By MARK SALVADOR

When I decided to write this article I asked myself what right I have to write about the 14 women who were murdered on December 6, 1989. Although I have a personal opinion about the senseless murder of these women, I don't think my opinion is so unusual.

What connects me to the Massacre is that I am a man, and so was Marc Lepine. This connection is inherent; I did not choose it, but neither can I deny that it is there. I, as a male, must take some responsibility for the terrible violence that happened on that fateful day.

I've asked my friends what they think about the massacre, and most vehemently assert that Marc was an inhuman monster. I've been told over and over that Marc, and others who commit brutal acts of violence, make up an extremely small part of the male population. Otherwise, I'm told, women would be murdered every day.

Many men avoid responsibility for violence by dismissing violent offenders as crazed lunatics — social anomalies. Those who label Marc Lepine as inhuman are in denial. By calling him a monster, they are ignoring the reality of the person himself.

Lepine separated the women from the men when he slaughtered those 14 women. This separation makes his act so merciless and utterly amoral that it shocked our nation. No males were targeted.

Although violent men are not blameless, their brutal behaviour is not completely their fault. The message of men's dominance of and control over women is at times endorsed by the media, family relationships and even some religious institutions. I am not attempting to excuse Lepine for his actions, but such injustice is never isolated; no one is immune to the external pressures of these social organizations.

Again, I ask myself what right I have to write about such a subject. The horrible act committed against these 14 women is the most tragic and visible example of men's violence against women in this century. But this event is just the tip of the iceberg. The public is never made aware of most assaults against women. Thousands of women are physically and verbally abused by males they already know. In other words, violence is also a man's issue.

Although I am not personally responsible for shooting those women on December 6, 1989, I somehow allowed such an event to happen. We all allowed this to happen. For as long as we deny humanity to Lepine, for as long as we deny that women are abused every day, and for as long as we remain uncaring about such abuse, we allow such acts to happen.

And this is violence.

Burst pipes dampen holiday spirits

BY STEPHANIE CARVIN

Freezing pipes have become a problem around campus due to the extremely cold weather Kingston has experienced during the last few weeks. Over the break there were two incidents of burst pipes in Ontario Hall and Gordon-Brockington Hall. However, the problem has also become a concern for students as insufficient heating and freezing temperatures threaten homes throughout the student housing area.

In the cases on campus, windows left open during the winter break caused pipes to freeze, and subsequently, burst. "It was a huge problem over the Christmas break when the buildings are shut down," said Campus Security Supervisor Jason Pullman. "It was a major concern for Campus Security." Even if windows are left only slightly open, he continued, cold air can get in from outside and freeze the pipes.

According to Pullman, the Control Heating Plant told Queen's Security at 12:20 p.m. on December 30 that there were heating problems in five or six rooms in Ontario Hall. Control persons were called in after it was discovered that a radiator pipe had broken because a window had been left open.

Sylvia Soderlind, head of the fine arts department, said she was not aware of any reports of damaged artwork. David Veitch, of Physical Plant Services, indicated that there was not much damage to

Queen's considers 17-course degrees

BY SHAWN BRIMLEY

The Faculty of Arts and Science is considering fundamental changes to its curriculum after completing the first review of the faculty in more than two decades.

The report, which took 18 months to complete, recommends a change in the philosophy of the faculty to a more independent and self-directed education, and would take advantage of more interdisciplinary and cross-disciplinary courses.

"It is critical that we rethink our programs," said Robert Silverman, dean of Arts and Science. "I am concerned with making the four years a student spends here more productive, more interesting and more useful."

"As a working draft the report is really quite impressive," said Anatole Papadopoulos, president of the Arts and Science undergraduate society. "What is intended is to get feedback from students and faculty."

"The ideas [in the report] have generated a lot of excitement in some departments. These are things that have never been talked about in the recent history of Queen's," observed Silverman.

The most dramatic proposed change is a reduction in the number of courses required to complete a degree from 19 to 17.

"Many students find that heavy course loads limit their exploration of ideas and preclude lateral learning and reflection," the report reads. "Whereas coping with deadlines and meeting well-defined standards is an essential life skill, we wish also to encourage independent, self-directed but appropriately supervised deep learning as a hallmark of a quality education."

Milan Konopek, Alma Mater Society academic affairs commissioner, is sceptical about the proposal. "Our main concern is whether Queen's students will be paying more for less," said Konopek. "I doubt that professors salaries and wages would be lowered, so we are concerned

New fine for writing exams without ID

BY REBECCA STELTER

Students not bringing their student cards to exams will be charged a fine of $15, beginning April, 1999. The Queen's Senate Committee on Academic Procedures' Sub-Committee on Exams passed a motion to enact this policy in November 1998, said Cindy Price, exams administrator.

"We've tried many steps over the years, yet the numbers of students writing without student cards is increasing."

— Cindy Price, exams administrator

The reasoning behind this policy, Price said, is that a large number of students come to their exams without student cards and are still permitted to write the exam. Despite the existence of checking methods and the fact that such exams are stamped with a notice that no photo identification was present, "there is no way of being 100 per cent sure that someone else didn't write that exam," Price said.

"Nine hundred and ninety four exams were written in April 1998, where students didn't have photo identification," Price continued. Although this is a small percentage of the total number of exams written, she added, it is still a significant number. "We've tried many steps over the years, yet the numbers of students writing without student cards is increasing."

The goal of charging $15 for each exam written without photo identification is to encourage students to make an extra effort to remember their student cards, she said. The are a number of students who repeatedly forget to bring their photo identification with them to their exams, Price said, and the new policy is expected to "provide some push" for such individuals.

When asked her opinion of the new fee, Natalie Bursztyjn, ArtSci '02 stated,

Weather forces some universities to close

BY QUEEN'S JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

Harsh weather conditions and excessive snowfall across Southern Ontario caused some universities to shut down yesterday, and led Queen's to plan an early meeting this morning to discuss possible closure of the university today and/or next week.

In Toronto, Mayor Mel Lastman and Transit Chief David Gunn warned people to stay inside yesterday after forecasters predicted 15 to 25 centimetres of snowfall. The city's transit system shut down on Wednesday after subway trains were stopped by snow and ice buildup on the tracks. GO trains also experienced problems caused by frozen switches, and stopped running or were delayed.

The University of Toronto closed at noon yesterday, according to Cheryl Sullivan, news services officer at U of T. York University closed at 10:15 a.m. yesterday and McMaster University was closed all day yesterday.

Closer to home, snow began to fall in Kingston before noon yesterday and continued throughout the afternoon.

John Cowan, Queen's vice-president (operations and finance), said Queen's closes down occasionally due to poor weather conditions. "We did close during the ice storm," said Cowan, who explained that as long as the power remained on, the buildings would be kept open. However, yesterday all departments were advised to send their non-essential staff home before 4:30 p.m. while it was still daylight.

The storm is being addressed on a daily basis, explained Cowan. A conference was scheduled to be held this morning at 5 a.m. to assess the situation and make the decision of whether the school should stay open.

"The situation is a little different for Queen's than say U of T.. Students are around here, there is little issue of public transportation problems."

— John Cowan, vice-president (operations and finance)

Cowan commented on the possibility of closing Queen's. "The situation is a little different for Queen's than say U of T. Only a small fraction of U of T students could turn up anyhow," said Cowan, due to the shutdown of transportation system in the city of Toronto.

"Students are around here, there is little issue of public transportation problems," he said, as most Queen's students live either in residence or in houses or apartments close to campus.

"In a way we're luckier," said Cowan. "Where we're less fortunate is with the power distributing." Due to last year's ice storm Kingston's power situation has become fragile, he explained. "If we lose power we're closing."

The Emergency Report Centre is instructing students to call their departments tomorrow morning to find out if classes are cancelled.

Transgender/Transsexual Policy Group Established at Queen's University

In the fall the Human Rights Office established a policy group to examine transgender/transsexual issues with emphasis, in the initial stages, on Queen's University Residences. The group has representation from Residences, Dean of Student Affairs, the transgender community, faculty and the Human Rights Office. The group is coordinated by Julie Darke, Anti-Heterosexism Coordinator of the Human Rights Office.

The group's mandate is to develop guidelines and recommend policies that will result in the residence system being available to, and comfortable for, trans-identified/transgendered students and staff.

Gender identity refers to one's self-image and self-definition. Historically, gender identity was assumed to be the same as one's biological sex at birth. Recently, it has been recognized that gender identity may not conform to biological sex, and that regardless of sex, individuals may self-identify as male, female, androgynous, third gender and undefined. "Trans-identified" and "transgender" are inclusive terms that are, generally intended to include cross-dressers, drag queens/kings, transgenderists, transsexuals and intersexed people.

Transgendered individuals have transitioning, emotional, medical, safety, financial and legal issues that other individuals do not face. In developing guidelines and policies, the policy group is sensitive to these issues. Initially the policy group is reviewing residence application forms, the Residence Life Information Booklet, room change policies, hiring practices, training (student staff, support staff, unionized staff, dining staff), programming, Residence Life resource manuals, safety issues and theme floors.

The group has requested information from other Canadian post-secondary institutions on policies, support groups, working groups/committees and is also reviewing information from the United States. To date very little work has been done in this area. A few institutions have included gender identity in their anti-harassment and anti-discrimination policies.

The Transgender/Transsexual Policy Group welcomes feedback on the work being done. Anyone wishing to submit comments and/or information please do so c/o Julie Darke, Coordinator, TG/TS Policy Group, Human Rights Office, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, K7L 3N6

AMS report projects $170,000 surplus

BY JOCELYN LAPORTE

The Alma Mater Society released their mid-year review this week, which projects a $170,000 year-end surplus. The figure is significantly higher than their initially projected deficit of $32,683, made earlier this year.

According to the mid-year review, the three main factors responsible for creating the surplus are an increase in enrolment by four per cent over last year, a health plan surplus and high AMS service performance.

The AMS is attempting to re-allocate some of the surplus funds, which are troubling considering its non-profit status. "We're not oblivious to the fact that it's student money and it should go to benefiting them," said Gord Moodie, vice-president (operations). "We can either lower fees or improve our performance, or do both," he added.

The AMS currently has a committee looking at health fees to see if they can be lowered. As well, they are considering additional projects that they now have the resources to fund.

Enrolment assumptions are normally based on the previous year's actual enrolment figures, explained Moodie. They are usually budgeted to remain stable or to slightly decline. This year's budget was more conservative than usual to account for the transfer of the Law Student's Society from the AMS to the Society of Graduate and Professional Students.

Approximately 590 more undergraduate students enrolled than were expected, increasing all AMS mandatory fees, Bus-It revenue and JDUC revenue. This surplus is estimated at $63,000. "We might have been a little bit too conservative on the enrolment," said Moodie, "but you wouldn't want to be in a situation where you have the reverse and instead of an increase in four per cent you have a decline."

The health plan surplus, paid back to Queen's by Canada Life Insurance, occurs if the premiums collected for a specific year exceed the amount of claims placed by students. "Last year students paid more in health plan fees than they claimed by quite a margin," said Moodie. The health plan reimbursement, which was not budgeted for, amounts to approximately $99,000.

Moodie does not foresee the same thing happening with the health plan this year, despite the $4.50 increase in AMS health plan fees. This is because of the introduction of the open formulary plan which replaced last year's managed care plan, which did not cover all prescriptions. "I think the claims will increase more than the health plan fee increased," he said.

The AMS services, including the Queen's Pub, the P&CC, Allic's, The Journal and the UBS Exchange, are cumulatively approximately $40,000 above budget. "The fact that so many of them are doing better than their budgets is excellent," Moodie said.

"The UBS is having a good year for their budget," said Moodie. The UBS

Bob McGill wins Rhodes Scholarship

BY ADAM KAMINSKY

Queen's student and athlete Bob McGill has joined world leaders, poet laureates and literary legends in one of the most elite groups of scholarly circles. On December 6, the fourth-year English Literature student was among 11 Canadians awarded a Rhodes Scholarship to study at Oxford University in England.

for the two available Ontario scholarships at an interview session in Toronto on December 6.

"On the Friday night there was an informal session with candidates and interview committee members," McGill explained. "It was slightly intimidating, there was a fantastic group of candidates."

The informal gathering was followed by a formal session with the interview committee, which was chaired by former Ontario Lieutenant-Governor Henry Jackman and included former Ontario premier Bob Rae.

"The questions were challenging, but not out to make a fool out of you," said McGill. "Queen's has a standing committee of former Rhodes Scholars who are now faculty that assist in the interview process and they prepared me well."

Upon hearing of the award soon after the interview, McGill described his reaction as "utter shock." As far as his place among the previous winners, McGill modestly said, "it makes me feel a bit incongruous with other former winners — I have no political ambitions."

Since winning the award, McGill has been the focus of media attention, as well as being "very pleasantly fêted" when he arrived home in Warton, he said.

He will be pursuing a Masters degree in English while at Oxford and, if time permits, he will continue to run. "My main focus there is school, but if there is an opportunity for me to run competitively, I will do it," explained McGill.

As the 16th Rhodes Scholar from Queen's in the past 17 years, and 44th since the scholarships inception in 1904, McGill joins an elite group from a very successful school.

"To get a Rhodes Scholar certainly enhances Queen's image and status," said Carolyn Kemp from Queen's Student Awards.

"I will always be known as a Rhodes Scholar," said McGill. "I would hardly want the culmination of my life to be at 22 years old. I hope that I take it as a starting point, not the high point of my life."

Rhodes Scholarships were established in 1904 by the estate of Cecil Rhodes, a British philanthropist and colonialist. The scholarships were designed to reward academic excellence, integrity, leadership and athletic prowess. Previous winners have included such luminaries as Bob Rae, John Turner and Bill Clinton. A designated number of Rhodes scholarships are awarded to different regions around the world.

McGill, a native of Warton, Ontario, is at the top of his class on the Dean's List and is captain of the Queen's Cross-Country team. In addition McGill participated in the English Department student council and peer tutoring, and writes regularly for The Queen's Journal.

Financial diagnosis dire for med students

BY LIANNE ELLIOTT

The availability of bursaries has been a source of dissatisfaction for medical students this school year. Many believe there should have been an increase in the number of bursaries granted in order to accommodate the rise in tuition, which increased by $2,053 for first-year students and $820 for returning second-year students this year.

"If we're going to pay more, [the school] should be putting more back," said second-year medical student Terrence Chin, who was unable to obtain a medical bursary.

Sabrina Ahmed, a first-year med student, said, "I haven't actually heard of anyone I know getting [a bursary]." Ahmed said she had expected to be granted a medical bursary and was denied.

However, contrary to many medical students' beliefs, Thelma Rikley, manager of Undergraduate Medical Education, insists there has been no decrease in medical bursaries.

"We have actually been topping up medical bursaries by combining with Student Awards in order to meet tuition rises," she said.

Even though medical bursaries are

Queen's deals with new phone numbers

BY MANDY MARRIOTT

Staff, students and administration returning to Queen's after the December break were greeted with changed external and internal campus phone numbers.

Jack Henderson, Information Technology Services manager of telecommunications, said numbers were changed primarily because the university was running out of phone numbers. ITS has been aware of this growing problem since 1995 but it has taken quite a bit of time to implement a solution, he explained.

"Since [1995] ITS has worked on thousands of programming changes and [done] a huge amount of detailed work" that would allow for the university to come up with a different numbering system, Henderson said. ITS implemented the final stage of the process over the holidays to minimize disruption to staff and students, he added.

The Queen's phone system itself was down for approximately 45 seconds during the changeover, while the academic and administrative voice mail systems were down for approximately 20 hours. The ResTel system's voice mail service was not affected.

Henderson reported that "there were a handful of problems," but explained that they were dealt with and corrected immediately.

Previously, when someone wanted to call a number on campus from outside the university, the first three digits of that number were 545. Although the last four digits for all the numbers have remained the same, the first three digits have been changed to 533. Internal university numbers have also been changed. In addition to the regular four-digit extension number, a three or seven has now been added to the beginning of the number, making it five digits long.

Henderson said he is quite pleased with the system, in that it is running a tenth to one percent errors. However, Henderson acknowledged that the university community may take a little

Queen's environmental scholars win awards

By CRYSTAL BONA

Three Queen's students were among 30 Canadian students recently awarded Governor General Scholarships, recognizing the leading role played by Canada Scholars in environmental engineering and environmental sciences.

Emma Bredesen and Heather Nicholson each received the Governor General Scholarship in Environmental Science, and Hanna Kruger received the Governor General Scholarship for Environmental Engineering.

Sponsored by Du Pont and Industry Canada, the purpose of the scholarships is to develop a higher environmental awareness in engineering. Fifteen awards of $1,500 are given annually in both categories. They are awarded to university students who are conducting studies relating to the environment and are planning a career in the field of environmental science. Nicholson, a fourth-year environmental science, biology major, learned of the award through a professor whom she worked with during the summer. "I think it's wonderful that the environmental science program at Queen's is getting the recognition it deserves because it's a fantastic program," said Nicholson.

Bredesen, a fourth-year environmental earth systems science student, is grateful for the attention being placed on the environment.

"It's encouraging to see the environment being acknowledged as a valid area of study not only through the existence of programs such as the school of environmental studies, but also through awards like this that recognize the work being done," she said.

Kruger, a fourth-year engineering student, was at first unsure of her eligibility for the award. "When I heard that it was an environmental engineering award, I didn't think I would qualify because Queen's doesn't have an environmental engineering program as such," she said.

"The Queen's approach is very multi-disciplinary. It's nice that it's recognized because it's not a traditional environmental engineering program."

"I've always been interested in the environment, so it's great to get an award that's aimed at the field," Kruger added.

Tom Harris, Dean of Applied Science, praised Kruger's efforts, as well as those of Nicholson and Bredesen. "It's a tremendous recognition of her accomplishments and achievements. The award to her and the other Queen's students speaks to the quality of students that come to this university," he said.

"My congratulations to all of them."

AMS hopefuls

By QUEEN'S JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

Chelsea Gay, ArtSci '99, and vice-president (university affairs) candidate Jon Krashinsky, ArtSci '99.

"We've been thinking about it for a couple of months now," Beltzner, one of the Who's Where/What's Next editors, said. Gay and Krashinsky are currently co-editors of Golden Words.

Lisa Mori, Con-Ed '99 and Con-Ed Students' Association president, confirmed that her team picked up a nomination package on Wednesday. Mori will be running for VP (UA) with presidential candidate AMS Municipal Affairs Commissioner Sarah Cornan, ArtSci '00, and VP (Ops) candidate and Media Services Director Owen Minns, ArtSci '97.

Some students were not as quick to confirm their intentions to run. Trevor Ogle, Arts '99 and Chair of the Board of Directors, said, "It's something that I've thought about and talked about." He was still not certain if he was going to announce his candidacy. "I've still got a few days," he said.

Nomination packages for the annual Alma Mater Society executive elections became available and many students have already expressed an interest in running.

According to Dan Fabiano, AMS Internal Affairs commissioner, as of yesterday afternoon, two nomination packages had been picked up from the Internal Affairs office. Fabiano said he expects four teams to pick up packages and only three teams to run. "I think that four would be a large number," he said. "Two is average, three is close but four is strange but not unheard of."

Fabiano was reluctant to release the names of those teams which had picked up packages as the teams "could drop out at anytime."

Mike Beltzner, Con-Ed '99, confirmed that he and his two running mates picked up a nomination package this week. Beltzner will be running for AMS president with vice-president (operations) candidate dents who feel they have been rejected unfairly," she said. Although exact statistics will not be fully compiled until late February, Pat Bogstad, Associate University Registrar, Student Awards, said the awards office has been able to increase funds available to medical students.

"There has definitely been an increase in applications for bursaries this year," Bogstad said, "but we were also able to give an increased amount of money." Bogstad said only a first round of bursaries has been distributed so far in order to aid those in greatest need, and more may be given out later. "We are continuing to review applications to ensure we have done the best to assist students where possible," she said. Many students have turned to the medical student government, the Aesculapian Society, done the best to assist students where possible," she said.

"The university only can do so much. Our efforts will have be focused at the provincial and federal government level."

— Miro Backo, Aesculapian Society president for help. Before choosing a course of action, society members are waiting to receive detailed statistical information about the availability of medical bursaries from Student Awards. However, they do believe they will have to concentrate on the government rather than Queen's University when lobbying for an increase in student financial support.

"The university only can do so much," said Aesculapian Society president Mira Backo. "Our efforts will have be focused at the provincial and federal government level," he added, noting an increase in OSAP as one of the Aesculapian Society's goals.

For medical students still seeking aid, Thelma Rikley suggests that "medical bursaries should be considered a last resort." Students should think about applying for school bursaries, OSAP and student awards instead.

Class sizes may decrease, Dean predicts

how the university would absorb the lost revenue from tuition.

"If they made the tuition lower, that would be great," said Matt Low, a second-year economics student. "It's not like the course load is that tough now."

"I never thought about revenue, I'm an academic dean," said Silverman. "I would argue that nothing should change. Students are paying for a degree. I don't see you getting less, I see you getting different."

"It's an assumption that students would do more learning. It's hard to say with any certainty how student's would spend the extra time," said Konopek. "If I had a reduced course load, I would be inclined to spend more time doing extra-curricular activities, or sleeping, or watching television."

Mia Kim, Con-Ed '99 agreed, "I don't think it would work, I don't think people will work more, they'll just have more free time."

"If you ask me whether I believe that all students would buy into this and take absolute advantage of the learning possibilities here, my answer would be no, [because] I'm not that naive," said Silverman.

Silverman added, "I believe we have a higher proportion of students than most [other universities] that would take advantage of the possibilities for deeper learning."

"The changes proposed in the report, if implemented, have the potential to draw those people who want more intellectual freedom," said Papadopoulos.

"If I had a reduced course load, I would be inclined to spend more time doing extra-curricular activities, or sleeping, or watching television."

— Milan Konopek, AMS academic affairs commissioner

"There are legitimate concerns but they are largely logistic and can be solved," he continued.

"We should never assume that a program or curriculum can't or shouldn't change," said Bob Crawford, dean of student affairs. "We need a setting at Queen's that fosters learning and extra-curricular development, these are areas where students lives are truly enriched. I believe that the report from the Faculty of Arts and Science is in harmony with these principles."

Konopek is also concerned with how the changes would affect the reputation of Queen's.

"It is unclear as to how graduate schools and potential employers would react to a student with a lower number of courses," said Konopek. "A major concern is that Queen's could be viewed as less rigorous."

"I'm not surprised that [Konopek] picked up on that," said Silverman. "But what's so magic about 20 or 19? A Harvard or Princeton degree is highly regarded, yet they only require 16 courses."

Silverman added, "Getting educated is the only issue here. Yes, you are getting fewer courses, but you are not getting less. I think one of the results would be smaller class sizes. Professors are not going to be teaching any less, so with a decreased course load I would think that class sizes would decrease."

"At a time when tuition levels are rising and the quality of education is declining, this report is potentially a huge step in the right direction," said Papadopoulos. "This could put Queen's back at the top."

"You have to remember that this report is a discussion document," said Silverman.

"Nothing is written in stone, or any other kind of material. This document suggests change, and better reflects how the world really is."

The review will be considered by the Arts and Science faculty board, and if accepted will be given consideration by each particular department. The proposals in the review may be acted upon in upcoming years.

Silverman added, "This document is premised with the notion that our students are different than students elsewhere, that our students are better."

Queen's graduate injured in Sierra Leone

By QUEEN'S JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

A Canadian journalist, Queen's graduate and former Queen's Journal editor-in-chief was shot in the head by rebel forces in Sierra Leone on Sunday. Ian Stewart, 32, is in stable condition at a hospital in London, England and is presently in a chemically-induced coma.

According to an Associated Press report, Stewart, AP's bureau chief in the Ivory Coast, was among reporters and government officials who were travelling in four cars through Freetown, Sierra Leone's capital, on Sunday.

A rebel fighter opened fire on the station wagon in which Stewart was travelling, injuring Stewart and killing Myles Tierney, a Kenya-based producer for AP Television News. David Guttenfelder, an AP photographer from Iowa also travelling in the car, was cut by broken glass.

Before Stewart was sedated, he was conscious, able to speak, and remembered the incident, said a Canadian Press report.

Stewart began working for AP in Pakistan, moved to Hanoi in 1996 and began his present assignment as bureau chief in Sierra Leone last year.

Stewart worked at The Journal between 1987 and 1990 and graduated from Queen's in 1990. He went on to complete a Master's degree from Columbia University's Graduate School of Journalism.

Committee formed to review services

was budgeted to lose money over three years. The UBS lost $52,000 last year and budgeted to lose $24,000 this year. The service is currently $7,000 over budget.

"Tricolour Express is definitely producing more than it used to," said Moodie. "Their book sales were quite low but Tricolour has had a good year, as well as their other merchandise... their costs are also lower than budgeted."

"There is a fear of services continuing on their own inertia and not because they are providing a valuable service."

— Trevor Ogle, chair of the Strategic Planning Committee

Alfie's is not experiencing a positive year in revenue, reported Moodie, as has been the case for the past few years. "The revenue from Alfie's has been declining for about 10 years," explained Moodie. "Despite the fact that everyone seems to love Alfie's, it seems to be one of the more challenging services to succeed in the long run," he added.

Particularly troublesome is a lower than expected revenue resulting from the new auto-fry equipment installed this year. "It's disappointing...the steady decline [in revenue] is puzzling," said Moodie.

In contrast, the Queen's Pub is experiencing their best financial performance in 10 years. "They haven't made over zero for over five years... I'm pleased that we're on track," said Moodie. The possibility of a correlation between Alfie's decline and the QP's increased revenue has not been formally reviewed. However, Moodie pointed out that Alfie's has been in decline consistently over a number of years. "Our problem is a problem of revenue decline," he explained.

Beginning this year, the Board of Directors Strategic Planning Committee is choosing two services to review each year at mid-year. The reports will be based on the service's performance over the past few years. This year the committee has selected the UBS exchange and Alfie's.

The reports will be an "all encompassing review" explained Trevor Ogle, chair of the Strategic Planning Committee, "basically whether or not it's serving its constituency," he said, adding that "there is a fear of services continuing on their own inertia and not because they are providing a valuable service."

This Friday the Strategic Planning Committee will pick two sub-committees to undertake these reviews. The committees will be composed of non-management members only, and will report back to the committee at large by Reading Week. "Constructive recommendations is really the goal," said Ogle.

Law students from the University of British Columbia, Sherbrooke and Queen's were in high spirits at the Cocamo last week as they participated in the annual Law Games. The event brings law students from across the country together to participate in four days of sports and activities, and to raise money for charity.

Fees 'provide some push'

"you get so stressed out before exams, the last thing you need to worry about is remembering your student card."

Conversely, Janice Lo, Con-Ed '01, said, "I think there should be a penalty. You should bring your student card."

"It's not all that unreasonable to ask," agreed Alan Burchell, Sci '99, "I would say that the $15 fine, although steep, has to be so to serve its purpose."

The fee will be charged to the student's Queen's account, and the student will not be able to access their marks until the fee is paid.

Alastair Mullin, communications officer for the University of Ottawa, said "the policy here is when you write an exam you bring your card. You have to prove you are the individual writing the exam," he said, but explained that it was up to the exam administrator to enforce this policy. Mullin said photos ID was required to be allowed to write the exam, preferably a student card. A similar situation exists at the University of Guelph. Neither school fines students without cards.

At Brock University, students are not permitted to write their exams without student cards. However, at the University of Waterloo, students who forget their cards may fill out a form which allows them to write their exams regardless.

while to get used to their new voice mail numbers. "If staff and faculty members key in their number without remembering to put the seven or three at the beginning of the number they could actually be calling a real number within the residences," he said.

When ResTel implemented the new phone systems in residences this summer, it was aware of the changes that would be made to the campus phone systems. Residents were assigned 533 numbers instead of 545 numbers.

Henderson expressed concern that some people may think changes have also been made to their dial-in access. As of yet, "the dial-in pools such as qlink have not changed," he said. "There will be a campaign later in the year to let the campus know when those changes will be made. For now people can stay with the number they have."

People who call the old campus numbers will hear a recording informing them that the number has changed and providing them with the new number.

The changeover seems to be running smoothly. Diane Reid, telecommunications representative for the Faculty of Arts and Science, said their office was not experiencing any problems with the # Damage 'quite a mess'

Control systems personnel, three residence custodians and Graham Brown, director of Queen's residences, were called to Gordon-Brockington. "They spent hours recharging and reheating the water [for the radiator]," Pullman said, indicating that pipes would have burst throughout the building if heat was not quickly restored. Residence Services did not have an estimate on the cost of the damage but were expecting to have it by early next week.

The problem of pipes freezing is also a concern for students living in the student housing area. Janet Pye, ArtSci '99, woke up Thursday morning to discover her apartment no longer had water or heat. "One of the neighbours had called the landlord," she said. "But we are not sure if the problem could be fixed." In the meantime Pye will have to stay with friends.

Sarah Corman, AMS municipal affairs commissioner, said students who are concerned about their pipes freezing should contact their landlords. "Students should make sure that the heat is turned up high enough," she said.

Corman indicated that a problem in many homes was that heaters were not able to heat enough, even if they were working all of the time. "It is definitely in the landlord's interests to hear about that immediately," she said.

If students are having trouble contacting their landlords Corman recommended that they contact the Municipal Affairs Commission or Patrick MacNeil at Town-Gown relations.

Things are back to normal at Gordon-Brockington Hall after the a water pipe burst over the holidays.

SCIENCE

Space: 1999

But where are the hover cars and moon bases?

I WAS READING SPIDER ROBINSON'S Mindkiller over the holidays and I was struck by the fact that this near-future novel — complete with picture phones, self-lighting marijuana cigarettes and wirehead junkies — was set in 1999, the year whose arrival I had just recovered from. It got me thinking about that perpetual problem of science fiction: predicting the course of the future. So, here's few predictions that science fiction has made and the progress we've made in achieving them.

Lunar Colonies

For me, the most poignant reminder that we haven't lived up to the expectations of science fiction writers in 1999 is that there are still no cities on the moon. Hell, we haven't even been back there for nearly 25 years. I guess once you've played golf on an alien world everything else is anti-climactic. And forget about Mars or the Jovian moons; it'll be a very long time before we even set a foot on Martian soil or European ice. Still, 1998 was a significant year for space exploration — or, at least, space construction.

The first component of the International Space Station, Russia's Zarya, was launched in November and was joined by the US's Unity in December. The two modules, now assembled after more than 21 hours of extra-vehicular construction work, will orbit the Earth for the next five months, empty, but occasionally sending signals back to mission control. In May, NASA will launch a shuttle for (note the inspiring name, now) a logistics resupply mission. Boy, those propellerheads at NASA sure know how to make the exploration of space as skull-numbingly dull as possible.

Speaking of inspired names, NASA also launched an experimental space craft called Deep Space 1, a small, solar-powered probe equipped with autonomous navigation and the most powerful engine ever used in space. Despite some early problems with that ion engine, the probe is running smoothly and is now 45 times further away from Earth than the moon.

Picture Phones

Now, honestly, why don't we have picture phones by now? Other than Touch Tone and Call Waiting, we're still using pretty much the same device Bell threw together in his basement. Prototypes for picture phones have been around since the sixties and with today's data compression technology, even copper wire has enough bandwidth for real-time video. So, there is, in fact, no reason why we don't have picture phones...

Except that no one wants to fix their hair or check their teeth for spinach just to answer the phone. And if you hit the "Voice Only" button to answer, people will think you're hiding something. The technology exists but unlike cell phones, which are about as popular as breathing oxygen these days, the demand just isn't there.

The Eugenics Wars

In the late sixties, science fiction television made its own prediction for the turn of the century. In the episode "Space Seed," Star Trek reviewed its own fictional history of the late 1990s when the world became embroiled in a war against a race of "genetic supermen" bent on taking over the planet. While it's unlikely that we'll experience the wrath of Kahn anytime soon, we have seen some stunning advances recently in genetics and cloning.

Just last month, a group of British and American scientists were the first to determine the entire genetic sequence of a multi-cellular organism. Caenorhabditis elegans is a worm-like nematode and its DNA sequence of 97 million base pairs has launched an entirely new branch of science: genomics, the analysis and comparison of entire genomes.

Along with the worm genome, the DNA sequences of several single-celled microbes were completed this year, including those of the bugs that cause syphilis, chlamydia, typhus and tuberculosis. These genetic codes could reveal proteins specific to those microbes that could be used as targets for vaccines or treatments. The sequencing work done in 1998 brings the total number of known DNA sequences — yeasts, bacteria, worms and all — to more than two dozen.

Cloning also made some headlines and raised some eyebrows this year. The winner of The Most Dubious Science Story of 1998 prize is undoubtedly the report out of South Korea that Lee Bo-yeon, a Seoul medical researcher, had cloned cells from an infertile woman and created an embryo, bringing it to the four-cell stage of development. The claim has yet to appear in any scientific journal and scientists at the Roslin Institute, Dolly's home turf, say that the experiment was halted too soon to tell if actual cloning ever took place.

So, while our world may not be the one science fiction writers have predicted — and in a lot of cases, that's a good thing — science fact has given us a world with surprising developments of its own. And a few of those developments could never have been predicted in a million years.

John Bowman believes that God is an iron and is convinced that Satan is a four-slice toaster.

Science Spectrum

Science news from around the world and beyond

Iceland sells its population's genetic code to biotech firm

Iceland has become the first country to sell its people's genetic information. The island country's parliament passed legislation last month to grant a biotech company exclusive rights to genetic, medical and genealogical data on Iceland's 270,000 residents. The data will be made available, at a price, to drug companies and the like to gain genetic insights into disease. Some opponents of the plan point out that the database could also be used for less scrupulous purposes, such as distilling personal information from the genetic data.

US scientists build nano-robotic arm from DNA

Researchers at New York University have built a prototype robotic arm from synthetic strands of DNA. The microscopic device consists of two rigid DNA strands joined by a bridge of DNA in the classical, "right-handed" form. When the bridge is exposed to a certain compound of cobalt, it twists itself into an unusual left-handed configuration, thereby rotating the two arms relative to each other.

THE IRONY WAS LOST ON ONLY A FEW As audiences across Quebec and Ontario lined up outside the theatres to see Titanic, a blockbuster about the latest in technology being brought low by a large chunk of ice, one of the worst natural disasters in Canadian history was about to rain down shards of ice from above.

It was a year ago, give or take eight days, that revellers stumbled out of New Year's at Alfie's to freezing rain and downed power lines. That night, at least half of the City of Kingston lost power as falling tree limbs tore down wires and overloaded transformers exploded. At that point, no one had a full grasp of what nature had in store. I, for one, sniggered as radio and television newscasters dubbed what I thought was only a little bit of freezing rain "Ice Storm '98." How wrong I was.

ON JANUARY 7 27.6 mm of freezing rain fell on Kingston. By the end of the storm, more than 50 cm of supercooled water had frozen to lampposts, telephone poles and rooftops. Hydro pylons once thought to be almost impervious to weather conditions crumpled like children's toys.

The statistics are stark. More than five million people were affected by at least one power outage. In Quebec and Ontario, 35,000 poles, 5,000 transformers and 1,300 steel towers were damaged. More than 13.5 million litres of milk had to be dumped by dairy farmers who did not have the capability to store or process it without power. Millions of trees were damaged at untold costs. Kingston Mayor Gary Bennett estimated that Kingston alone lost four to six thousand old growth trees in its urban forest. Thirty-five people across eastern parts of Canada and the United States died from storm-related causes.

WE ALL HAVE STORIES to tell about Ice Storm '98. Besides photographs, our stories are our only records of the dark days and cold nights last January. Everyone strings together those moments differently. I, for one, remember the way University Street looked as I walked down the middle of the road mid-day on Thursday. As I stepped gingerly over and under downed power lines, I remember wondering if Armageddon would look like this. People met on the street and talked excitedly. This was fun, interesting.

It seems that many who reminisce about this time last year remember the good that came of Ice Storm '98, not the bad. Although Kingston was one of the areas hardest hit, it was not located in the infamous "triangle of darkness," an area which included Saint-Hyacinthe, Farnham and Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu. We did not suffer under a reported 100 millimetres of ice. Perhaps if we had emerged from the "triangle" after 33 days without power, we would not have had such happy stories to tell. Instead, we threw out or donated all the food in our freezers, slept on a friend's floor, went to a shelter or headed home.

It felt like we were in the middle of a portentous and important event. Yes, we were bored. Yes, we were irritated that, when it came to necessary task of cancelling classes, the administration reacted with the speed of a tortoise. Yes, we played every single board game ever invented. But we were part of a natural disaster, something most of us were never likely to experience again. Even Mayor Bennett, when asked to name his favourite memory about the Ice Storm, mentioned that he was the first mayor of the Kingston region ever to declare a state of emergency.

Bennett, like many others, was quick to point out another highlight of Ice Storm '98 — the amazing number of volunteers who turned out to help those in need. As a community, Kingston pulled together, both before and after the storm, to help those in need. In areas affected by the storm, 539 shelters were set up to house those without power. Approximately 16,000 military troops and reservists were called in, the largest humanitarian deployment ever of Canadian Armed Forces. Thousands of volunteers staffed shelters, helped clear debris and assisted those in need.

Friends and neighbours were quick to offer help that wouldn't have been forthcoming in ordinary circumstances. Friends offered up beds, sofas and floots to those whose houses or apartments lacked power.

The future on ice

Lives lived, lessons learned for next time

By ERIC MORRIS

50 WEEKS. That's how long until Y2K — geek-speak for the uncertainty and danger posed by computer programs miscalculating the turn of the century — moves from the hypothetical to a potentially harsh reality.

Having experienced last year's ice storm, Kingston residents and members of the Queen's community are perhaps as familiar as anyone in this country with what's at stake come Y2K, how chaotic life can be without heat, without electricity and without the basic necessities of life that we so easily take for granted.

When you talk to those who lived through last January's storm, what is now the most expensive natural disaster in Canadian history, everyone seems to have their own stories of abandoning work, school or home for a week, tales of lousy meals, cold days, and coldest nights.

Etched in the memory of Jim

Keach, general manager of Utilities Kingston, is a mental database of service wires, trees, and dedicated staff members cross-referenced over a 10-day period. Freezing rain began on a Wednesday night, last January 7, and it was only by the following Wednesday that Keach made it home. Like many who worked at the city's utilities company, he worked around the clock, sleeping four or five hours a night on a mattress in his office.

Seven days, and $1.5 million later, 90 per cent of the city regained power, with the last customer regaining service on Saturday, January 17.

2,500 of the 18,000 overhead service wires were knocked down, plunging 80 per cent of Kingston into darkness. Though some of the supporting poles collapsed, the bulk of the damage was from the weight of the rain snapping branches which fell on powerlines. The rebuilding process, reattaching those wires to homes and poles, Keach says, was initially quite slow. "You'd put one up and four would come down." Seven days, and $1.5 million later, 90 per cent of the city regained power, with the last customer regaining service on Saturday, January 17.

The city had emergency plans in place, yet Keach didn't find them particularly useful in dealing with the storm. "The problem with [emergency plans] is that they don't really address specifics," he said. Most people had never seen, never even heard of an ice storm prior to last year, let alone planned for one.

Whether it comes to ice storm recovery or snow removal, students have often questioned the city's priority on maintaining the student housing area. Keach, however, says all areas, including student housing, over," said Lindsay Hogan, whose apartment on Princess Street was one of the few which maintained power throughout the storm. At one point Hogan and her housemate were sharing their floor space with seven extra people. "I got to know people better who I wouldn't have gotten to know otherwise," smiled Hogan.

Bob Crawford, dean of student affairs, took five extra people into his home. "It wasn't too packed up," he said of the guests. "I just wished I would've been home more."

Are we telling each other these stories to ease our collective conscience?

Instead of spending time playing card games by candlelight, Crawford and other university administrators had to deal with issues such as what to do with students in residence and whether or not to cancel classes, in addition to the hundreds of concerned parents who began calling any and all administrators they could find.

"I remember the student angst, the anxiety," said Crawford of that time. Many students weren't sure whether to get out of what many called "the war zone" or to remain in case classes resumed.

"I THINK THAT THE ADMINISTRATION was slow to realize the intensity or the size of the disaster," said Marisa Nelson, who was co-editor-in-chief of The Queen's Journal at the time of the storm. "I felt at the time that they reacted very slowly."

While the administration wasn't the only group slow to respond, others, such as Nelson and her co-workers, were quick to realize the magnitude of what was happening. On Thursday morning, as many began clearing and cleaning, as well as moving to assist those in need, staff at The Journal carried computer equipment to the boardroom of the AMS. With the help of Matt Lang, whose efforts Nelson described as "incredible, unbelievable," a new computer system was set up, and those staff members and volunteers who could make it in to the JDUC worked to put together the regular Friday issue. Steve Stone, The Journal's liaison at 1000 Islands Publishers, drove to Toronto through the freezing rain to make sure the paper got printed — his presses in Gananoque had been without power since the beginning of the storm.

The Journal then set up a hotline for students to call for information, and volunteers wearing mittens sat in the then-cold Journal house to staple the phone number to 9,000 papers. People then took paper routes and hand-delivered the paper because students would not be on campus to pick up the paper themselves. "I can't believe that we got the paper out," marvelled Nelson.

Golden Words also managed the next-to-impossible task of putting out a regular weekly issue with classes cancelled and volunteers few and far between. Despite the disaster, Words staffers held their regular Sunday press night and worked through the night and the next day to get the paper to bed. By the time the newspaper arrived on campus, students had begun trickling back into Kingston and, because of the extraordinary efforts of the Golden Words crew, they had a few laughs to warm their cold, dark homes.

Another unbelievable act of student dedication took place inside the Campus Activities Commission. Queen's Model Parliament, an annual event during which Queen's students travel to Ottawa to participate in a mock session of parliament, was on the verge of being cancelled because of the Ice Storm. Students were scattered across Ontario, many had gone home in search of a warm bed and those in residence had been told not to return until power was restored. Ottawa itself had been hit hard by the storm, and organizers were unsure how the ice would affect the arrangements made months before in anticipation of the event. More than 50 per cent of the speakers scheduled at the event cancelled because their constituencies were in a state of emergency.

After much agonizing, chair Kristen Bond and the members of the Model Parliament Committee made the decision to continue on with the event. They then called 300 students, either at their Kingston number, at friends' houses or at the home phone number listed in the Who's Where to let them know that the event was still on, and organized for a late bus to take those just returning to Kingston to the event in Ottawa. Because of the efforts of Bond and the committee, most of those who originally planned to take part in Model Parliament were able to attend, and the event went off with many a hitch.

THESE FEW ACCOMPLISHMENTS seem to amount to very little in the face of the days and weeks of work done by the workers for Ontario Hydro and the Canadian Armed Forces cleaning up the mess left by Ice Storm '98. True, they may not be large accomplishments, but the way Queen's students pulled together showed us that we are capable of more resourcefulness and dedication than we had once thought possible.

After the clean up, there were some initiatives to continue the spirit of coming together fostered by our time of ice and darkness. The Campus Activities Commission sponsored a t-shirt campaign to collect money for the Ice Storm Relief Fund that raised thousands of dollars. In addition, there are several organizations raising funds to help the City of Kingston with replanting the trees killed by the storm.

We tell each other the stories we have from the Ice Storm, our nights in the dark huddled under the covers, reading by candlelight. We talk to connect ourselves after a time when we were more isolated from each other than ever before. In that time of isolation, we showed, in the only manner we could without the aid of technology, that we do care about each other, and that we will pull together to help out when times get difficult. Because so few of us were in real danger at the time of the storm, we tell stories of that week as if it were a great adventure.

I wonder, looking back at the only natural disaster I have ever experienced, if we are telling each other these stories to ease our collective conscience. The stories we tell are of great courage and caring, but after Ice Storm '98 ended, where did the courage go? Are we, in fact, recounting the time of giving and digging deep in order to absolve us of the responsibilities we have to people who, while not suffering the effects of an ice storm, are facing their own personal natural disasters? Are we making heroes of ourselves because we are guilty of not continuing this tradition of giving and helping?

We are only students, we say to each other, in order to explain why we do not help out others in our community. Yes, we are students, but Ice Storm '98 showed us how much we could accomplish as a community. Will it take another natural disaster to get us to act that way again?

Tara Mansbridge hopes never to be called an ice princess.

received equal treatment during ice storm recovery. "We tried very hard," he says, "to make sure we had crews in every quadrant of the city."

Utilities Kingston is working on a number of initiatives to better prepare the city for this winter, as well as future ice storms and other severe weather conditions. Always mindful of weakened trees that could break and cause interruptions in power service, Utilities Kingston has doubled the resources devoted to cutting down branches or trees that pose such risks, most notably those damaged during the ice storm.

Utilities Kingston has doubled the resources devoted to cutting down branches or trees that pose such risks, most notably those damaged during the ice storm.

It was trees weakened from the ice storm, Keech says, that in all likelihood produced prolonged power shortages during the rain and windstorm of last September's Homecoming weekend. Weakened branches, most notably near both the Donald Gordon Centre on Union Street and Chown Hall, collapsed, tearing down overhead powerlines and once again plunging student housing into darkness.

As well, the city is reviewing its policy on overhead and underground wiring, the latter of which is far less susceptible to such acts of nature and is what allowed the lower end of Princess and other downtown locations to maintain power during the storm.

An issue here, as always, is cost. "There's a horrendous cost difference between overhead and underground," Keech said, with the underground option being about 10 times more expensive. That's why 75-80 per cent of Kingston receives power through overhead wires, and that's why it's also likely, despite the vulnerability of overhead wiring, to remain that way. An overhead to underground conversion would cost the city at least $100 million, money the city simply does not have.

THE ICE STORM PROVED JUST as troublesome for those living within Queen's Residences last year, with residence administrators also hoping to learn from last year's unique weather conditions to better equip them for future emergencies.

Graham Brown, director of Queen's residences, says the university has always had plans to deal with buildings that forced residents out and could not be occupied for a short time, but like the city, the scale and magnitude of last January's damage caught its administrators off-guard. Seven of 12 residences lost power and ran on emergency power for a few days. By the first Saturday after the storm, however, the emergency power was drained, disabling fire protection and emergency lighting.

While there had already been talk of evacuating the students from the residences without power, a fire in a Leonard bathroom that Saturday afternoon emphasized that residences were no longer safe. "It became clear," Brown says, "that we couldn't provide adequate fire safety protection."

While other residences were able to run on emergency battery power for a short time,

Victoria Hall was the only residence on campus with a diesel-powered emergency generator. While the generator was not able to heat the building, the building maintained most of its heat, and that, combined with the generator powering the emergency lights and fire safety system, allowed students to remain in Vic for the duration of the storm.

Residence administrators are now deciding how best to prepare for future emergencies. Two options being discussed, said Brown, are ensuring all residences have access to generators like Vic Hall's, or replacing the overhead power lines that supply electricity to residences to underground lines. Cost again becomes an issue, as Brown explained that the generator option would cost "well into the six-figures," with the installation of underground power lines possibly costing more.

The massive power of the storm was able to sever this lamp-post in half.

Almost as soon as last year's ice storm recovery began, Queen's residences and Utilities Kingston began taking steps to ensure that they're prepared for any future ice storms or severe weather conditions. And as for Y2K? Well, Keech says Kingston's ready for it, but won't go as far to guarantee continued power service beginning midnight, next January 1. Another few days of freezing rain and falling power lines are one thing, but when it comes to the turn of the century all bets are off.

Eric Morris has the power.

Up to here

AS IF SURVIVING THE BITTER COLD of Kingston's winter wasn't enough. In this sometimes ass-backwards city that we call home, we must also brave waist-high snowdrifts that obstruct sidewalks and make walking to class a nightmare. You wouldn't know it from simple observation, but the city is responsible for plowing the sidewalks in front of our homes. No, they have not forgotten this year; they're simply overwhelmed and under-prepared to deal with the deluge of snow that has fallen on Kingston in the last two weeks. As in past years, the city has failed to meet the reasonable expectations of its citizens and clear enough of the snow to make walking or driving in Kingston safe.

For most of us this amounts to inconvenience and increased danger — having to trudge single file through uneven mounds of snow or walk on the road. For those who are less able-bodied such as the elderly and those in wheelchairs, transportation ceases to be an option. This is clearly unacceptable.

As in past years, the city has failed to meet the reasonable expectations of its citizens and clear enough of the snow to make walking or driving in Kingston safe.

One proposed solution to our city's ineptitude at snow removal was to mandate the property owners to clear the sidewalks adjacent to their homes. Perhaps it is time Mayor Gary Bennett revisit this plan.

In the meantime, we are not powerless to dig ourselves out of this problem. All it takes is a shovel and the initiative of students to clear their own way through the snow. For those without a shovel, the Municipal Affairs Commission of the AMS is selling them for only $5.

On the front line

THE ATTACK THAT LED TO THE death of an American television producer and the wounding of a Canadian journalist in West Africa last week, is a reminder of the sacrifices made by journalists who put themselves in harm's way to cover stories that wouldn't otherwise be told. Myles Tierney and Ian Stewart were attacked while travelling by car in the war-torn city of Freetown, capital of Sierra Leone. Stewart, a graduate of Queen's University and a former Queen's Journal editor, survived the attack and is currently in stable condition after surgery in London. Stewart and Tierney were on the front-line of journalism, covering stories that are neither easy nor safe to cover.

It is unfortunate, therefore, that much of the public's perception of journalism in recent years is directed at the increasing sensationalism of the North American press. From internet reporters like Matt Drudge to the once venerable daily papers, the press is often vilified for its eagerness to report unfounded rumors and its ability to sink to new lows in its coverage of politicians' and celebrities' private lives.

While much of the public's growing mistrust of journalism is justified, it should not impugn the integrity and reputation of those on the front lines of the profession. There is significant value in the work of journalists who risk their own lives and forego the comforts of home to report on conflicts in far away countries. These reporters make to uncover the truth and report it objectively. After all, not every reporter writes about Monica Lewinsky.

Merci Montréal

"Seems to me now,
That the dreams we had before
Are all gone,
Nothing more Than confetti on the floor"
— Happy New Year, ABBA.

A LONG AWAITED REVELATION was working its way from the bowels of my brain to the tip of my tongue. Something that would shape the new year, something that would deeply affect the minds of everyone who heard it.

Why are there so many good-looking girls in Montreal than in Kingston?

And it hit me on the dance floor, at the stroke of midnight, as Foufounes Electrique's MC belted out a new year's welcome that neither I nor half the patrons of the trendy Montreal club could understand. It was giant, confidence shattering, and it was so profound and so clear, that I immediately knew it to be true.

But first, why are there so many more good-looking girls in Montreal than in Kingston?

Call it shallow, call it superficial, call it Alfie's hiring policy, it's undeniable.

"And who are you to judge looks?" you're probably saying as you scrutinize the picture below. Admittedly, the only celebrity I've been likened to is that lazy-eyed fteak from Radiohead. But I was there, man. I asked around, and everyone agreed: Montreal has a disproportionately higher percentage of good-looking people than Kingston.

People on the street were more than willing to offer suggestions. "Montreal is the city of love," said one passetby, "good-looking people just flock there."

"Grooming" opined another. During a lengthy discussion back in Kingston it was theorized that the discrepancy was combination of Montreal's younger club crowd and the fact that we were all drunk and horny at the time. One person thought that francophones were just better looking people. They were ignored.

Some figured that much of the attraction was due to tongue piercing fantasies. Other confessed being drawn to the tall, thin, dark and pouty type, of which there were beaucoup. And yet, despite all deliberations, a consensus appeared unattainable.

So, as of now, it has not been resolved. Maybe someone has the answer. Perhaps you have the answer. If you think you do, please email or write to The Journal, because we've got a lot of confused people out there who need to know.

Letters to the Editors

Student-athletes do have a say

Dear Editors,

First, I would like to take this opportunity to commend The Queen's Journal for covering the emerging issue of the Queen's Athletics policy on "Rookie Nights" in such depth, in Adam Kaminsky's cover story entitled "Rookie Nights debated," which appeared in the December 4, 1998 edition. However, after reading the article, it struck me that some of the issues which appeared might require some clarification.

The "Rookie Night" policy adopted by the U.A.C. is a pro-active, yet flexible approach with an eye cast to the best interests of all.

Make no mistake, the issue of "Rookie Nights" and the activities which take place during these events has the potential to be of critical importance to the Queen's Athletics community, and thus to Queen's as a whole.

The "Rookie Night" policy adopted unanimously by the University Council on Athletics (U.C.A.) at its October 20 meeting is a pro-active, yet flexible approach; one with an eye cast towards the best interests of both the institution and the student-athletes. It is the portrayal of the policy as a polarizing issue, dividing "administration" and student interests which is inaccurate and damaging.

The student-athlete representation on the University Council on Athletics, as well as on its Inter Collegiate Athletics Committee (I.A.C.), belies any assertion that a student "ribber-stamp" was sought or required. The structure of each body allows for the fact that students, voting as a bloc, could defeat any measure, however the unanimous consent of both bodies suggest a broadly-based recognition of the problem, and a wide endorsement of the policy output designed to address it.

Incidents including drinking and driving and drinking on university transport highlight the active role that must be taken.

It should be understood that the U.C.A. seeks to exercise its administration mandate with two goals in mind: to ensure the continued viability of Queen's Athletics and to ensure that the numerous programs under its authority best serve the Queen's and Kingston community. Needless to say, the body receives its funding from and accordingly, is constantly advocating for and implementing programs which are seen to be in the best interests of all students.

There can be no denying that alcohol abuse on campus is a significant problem. The widely reported incidents which have taken place at this and other universities tanging from consumption on university transport to drinking and driving, highlight the active role that administrative bodies must take in order to prevent tragedy. The safety concerns in this area are self-evident, however this is not to suggest that there are not legitimate institutional, so-called "image" concerns.

Rookie parties are an element of student-athlete life which have traditionally been shielded from view, yet they have hardly been without incident. The safety of students is of the highest priority and the heightened peer pressure at such events carries the potential for poor decision-making.

Those teams that take safety precautions for their student-athletes are to be commended as they are imposing their own standards to prevent the injury and protect the dignity of their athletes. The objective of this policy is to set a minimum standard for conduct at such events and will not affect those teams that have been exercising self-imposed restraint, all the while undoubtedly enjoying their those who have not.

The U.C.A.'s adoption of the I.A.C. policy on "Rookie Nights" is far-sighted, addressing an issue before our "luck ran out" and a serious incident took place. However, the policy is flexible, allowing for a case-by-case assessment of facts and contains no prescribed penalties. The extensive student administration here at Queen's allows both those representatives and their constituents to voice their concerns and contribute to the broad-based athletics program.

If student-athletes, or student at large, find themselves dissatisfied with an aspect of their experiences with Queen's Athletics, there is ample student representation in the so-called "administration" to deal with such issues. Participation on the U.C.A. or its standing committees is not necessarily a significant time commitment and it is gratifying to know that you are contributing to an increasingly important aspect of student life.

If student-athletes, or students at large, are dissatisfied with their experiences with Queen's athletics, there is student representation in the "administration".

The chances to contribute to the mandate of the U.C.A. and its subcommittees are not limited to those who choose to do so directly. Find out who your representatives are, be informed about the issues and make your opinion known to those who do have a vote. The ability of students to have an impact on the policies and priorities of Queen's Athletics is shown by the expressed desire to have a student sir as Chair of the Council and this is but one of many ways that students can have input into the process.

Euro superstar

THE GREAT SUPRANATIONAL unknown. That's the only way of defining the Euro, a new currency that will restructure how global markets function. The Euro introduces a brave new world in the global economic kingdom; no longer is the almighty United States greenback the global barometer of fiscal net worth. Eleven European nations have taken the bold step of abandoning their francs, marks, and other national currencies — thus risking monetary sovereignty — to rival the U.S. dollar.

At last, there is a region to give the U.S. some serious competition. And being pro-Euro isn't an abandonment of statehood or sovereignty; it is simply the beginning of a new economic dynasty that gives the world an alternative to U.S. economic dominance.

The current instability of East Asia, along with the deepening economic crisis of the Third World, has made the creation of this currency more important than ever. While one could qualify the U.S. as a "necessary evil empire" in this global recession, it is undeniable that one single power can no longer carry the world economy on its shoulders. The Euro will provide another option for global investors.

Of course, there are potential pitfalls in this great saga of money and power. Like any great soap opera, the self-interest that comes with being a nation in one of the most turbulent regions in world history has a long and rooted past. National sovereignty will be questioned time and time again. Economies will have a difficult time adjusting at first. Some, like the great economists of the world, argue that currency is one of the most important markers of nationhood; it is a symbol of identity that helps to define what a nation is all about.

The current wave of hyper-nationalism throughout Western Europe, as well as the rise of leftist coalition governments throughout the continent, may also be potential hazards on the road to economic integration.

The U.S. is a "necessary evil empire" in this recession, however the Euro will provide another option.

But perhaps the most important element of the new era of economic unity in Europe is the United States. How will they react in the long-term? What will Alan Greenspan, the chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve, do to counter the new competition from across the pond? Will it result in regional economic warfare? Or a recession on an unprecedented scale?

All of these factors are crucial in determining the long-term success of the Euro. However, the creation of the Euro is an important turning point in the history of the world. For the first time, a single continent is unified under the banner of one economic standard. And that is perhaps a sign of some sort of progress, or at the very least, a measure that even in these turbulent times, states can co-operate with each other for a supposed common good.

Just the facts

Discussion around the topic of abortion is important and should be encouraged. As members of a democratic society, we must defend the right of people to express their opinions, whether or not we approve of them. However, if "facts" are used to defend opinions, it is essential that these "facts" be accurate and based on reliable, scientific research. Unfortunately, that was not the case in Sindi Sabourin's posters and letter (The Journal, November 30, 1998). Sabourin's four facts about abortion are false and misleading.

Fetuses do not "scream in agony" during or respond by doubling their heart rate before an abortion as claimed in the letter.

1) Fetuses do not "scream in agony" during an abortion procedure and do not respond by doubling the heart rate before the procedure is even initiated, as claimed in the letter. It was also claimed that these responses occur as early as four weeks gestation, even though the fetal heart cannot be detected until seven weeks gestation. Assuming that these responses occur also assumes that the fetus has some consciousness or awareness of what is happening.

The neocortex, the part of the brain responsible for highest cognitive functions such as awareness and conscious control of movements, is not developed until the fifth month of gestation. Until then, the fetus' bodily functions are reflexive — the heart beats from its internal pacemaker and the limbs move through spinal reflexes. Attributing "screaming in agony" to a fetus early in gestation is in direct contradiction with scientific knowledge about development.

2) The so-called woman's fight against the embryo at eight days gestation is really just the process of implantation into the uterine wall. Sabourin's claim of the fetus "winning" and implanting nine times out of ten is also blatantly false. More than 50 per cent of conceptions fail to continue to viability, and most of these are lost in the 14 days after fertilization, before the woman even knows that she is pregnant. The majority of these are non-viable conceptions with chromosomal abnormalities. This process is mediated by genetics and cell development, not warfare between woman and fetus.

3) Regarding the complexity of DNA "at the 3-cell stage: There is no 3-cell stage. Cell division is exponential, from 1 to 2 to 4 to 8 and so forth. As well, every biological entity that is not a clone has a unique DNA, regardless of its stage in development. The fertilized ovum is the stem cell from which all other cells emerge by division.

Regardless of their position in this debate, misinformation must be condemned.

4) The fact that fertilized ova can be transferred from one woman to another does not imply that this cell or group of cells "is a human being, independent of its biological mother." The cells, embryo, or fetus are not at any point in gestation independent but in fact are entirely dependent on the woman for nutrition, protection, and survival. It can easily be argued that the fetus is in fact part of the woman as demonstrated by its attachment through the umbilical cord and placenta.

It is important that differing views about abortion be expressed and discussed. These discussions can be based on ethical, religious, and social views as well as scientific fact. The invention and dissemination of pseudo-science by Sindi Sabourin and other anti-choice supporters only serves to discredit their arguments and with them those of the whole anti-choice movement. Regardless of their position in this debate, it is important that such misinformation is condemned. I'm all for discussing abortion if it is done in a responsible way. It is unfortunate that this discussion was started by sensationalism and not science.

RMC captures Carr-Harris Cup

By NATHAN SAGER

The 13th annual Carr-Harris Cup featured two teams with losing records, but that could have fooled many in attendance. A standing room only throng at Constantine Arena was witness to a heart-taking contest, as the host RMC Paladins claimed local bragging rights entering the new millennium, prevailing 4-3 over the Queen's Golden Gaels on an overtime goal by Paul Whalen.

"We had every reason to feel good going into overtime," said Queen's head coach Chris MacDonald, whose charges fought valiantly, only to fall to 3-9-4 on what is becoming a perplexing winter for the Tricolour. "I felt we'd carried the majority of the play... the only thing that was worrisome were the odd-numbered rushes we had begun to give up... sooner or later, someone was going to score. We were fairly sure it'd be us."

With the officials choosing to enforce a standard of decorum that MacDonald dubbed "play-off officiating," levying but a solitary minor penalty, what prevailed on the ice was an aggressive, fast-paced game.

Though the laissez-faire application of the rulebook seemed to be of greater benefit to the host side, MacDonald expressed no grievance with the referees' work. "We were told before the game [about the officiating]," he said, adding, "I appreciated being told that beforehand."

RMC drew first blood at the 16-minute mark of the opening stanza, as Whalen potted his first goal of the evening after coralling a loose puck during a goalmouth scramble. Less than two minutes later, the Gaels drew even. Captain Scott Richardson, who played an inspired game, began the play by carrying the puck deep into the offensive zone, where Jason Flynn set up Rob Mailloux in the slot to best Paladins' netminder Tom Connerty with an impeccable backhand.

The tie held up until the 10:25 mark of the middle frame, when the Paladins recaptured the lead, as forward Pierre Leroux caught Queen's goaltender Jason Skilnick napping with a weak shot from beyond the faceoff circle. Shortly thereafter, RMC doubled its lead. With the Gaels caught on an ill-timed line change, winger Rob Medeiros was wide open as he received a long pass, skated in and slipped the puck past Skilnick.

With their chance of victory waning, the Gaels scored a vital goal in the last minute of the second stanza, as blueliner Wes Booker fired home Flynn's rebound 40 seconds before the second intermission.

Emerging for the third period, with Kevin Dunbar relieving Skilnick between the pipes, the Gaels pressed fervently for the equalizer, repeatedly compelling RMC to ice the puck in desperation. Goaltender Connerty was unimpeachable in maintaining an ever-slim advantage. However, with six and a half minutes remaining in regulation time, Gaels' left winger Matt Thorne stunned the crowd, beating Connerty on a shot from a bad angle.

Both teams had prime scoring chances during the final minute of regulation play. Paladin defenceman Ian Perreault missed a wide open net, while Flynn found himself alone in front of the RMC goal, only to have Connerty deflect his shot away.

So, it was on to overtime, where at 2:31, Whalen bore in on Dunbar, faked a pass, and flipped home a backhand, inciting a joyous victory celebration at centre ice.

Afterward, MacDonald felt obliged to give due credit to the victors. "Their effort and second effort was phenomenal. Ultimately, they played a little more desperately than we did," he explained.

As for his own club, MacDonald commented, "We have to regroup, and we should do that quickly. There were a lot of positive aspects to take from this game, even though we lost."

A quick recovery will be imperative for the Gaels, who host Guelph and Toronto in important divisional contests this weekend.

END OF AN ERA

Michael Jordan has retired, again. This time it seems conclusive and basketball fans around the world are a lot poorer for losing the most spectacular athlete of our generation. With Jordan's retirement coming on the heels of a debilitating lock-out, basketball must find a way to win back fans without the help of 'Air' Jordan. The great Chicago Bulls star will now spend his time golfing and raising his children. The most out-of-this-world athlete that we have ever seen will now pass his days doing very mundane activities.

CHAMPION VOLUNTEERS

The inaugural Bowl Championship Series has selected a NCAA football champion and it is the University of Tennessee Volunteers. With a tight win in the first 'championship game' at the Fiesta Bowl in Tempe, Arizona over the Florida State Seminoles, the Volunteers were crowned champions for the first time in more than 50 years. Phil Fulmer and his gang lost star quarterback Peyton Manning at the end of last season and still survived close games to end the season a perfect 13-0.

LEGENDARY HEIST?

With one smooth move, Toronto Maple Leafs General Manager Mike Smith has turned from village idiot to genius. By trading discontented goaltender Felix Potvin to the New York Islanders for flashy 21-year old defenceman Bryan Berard Smith committed a heist of Jesse James proportions. Potvin, who has been AWOL from the team for the past month, was made disposable with the off-season signing of Curtis Joseph. Berard was a former first overall draft pick who won the Calder Trophy as rookie of the year in 1995, but fell into dis-favour with Isles' coach and GM Mike Milbury. Berard has phenomenal potential, but sometimes gets lost inside his own blue line. A straight up trade of a discontented, obsolete goalie for a young offensive defencemen with a huge up side. Hooray for Smith!

IF CHRISTMAS CAME EARLY...

- Quebec City would win its lawsuit and Salt Lake City would forfeit the Olympic Games.
- A new saviour for NBA basketball would arrive and make us all love that game.
- NCAA football would have a national champion that won it in a playoff.

A wild ride for Gaels basketball

By ADAM KAMINSKY

Nothing silences the home crowd like a visiting team bearing the buzzer for victory. It was University of Toronto forward Samantha Burrows who acted like a muzzler for the Bartlett Gym faithful on Saturday evening.

With the score tied at 77, the U of T Varsity Blues collected a rebound, sped the ball down the floor and with just over a second remaining Burrows released a jump shot from eight-feet out which hit glass and fell through, giving the hated rivals a significant road victory and second place in the Ontario University Association's East Division.

The loss for the Gaels, who are now 4-3 in league play, was particularly startling as Queen's came off of a tremendous tournament victory in Waterloo during the holiday break. The team defeated McMaster by 22, University of New Brunswick, which was ranked sixth in Canada, and University of Winnipeg, which was ranked fourth nationally in the final.

With the successful run in Waterloo, the Gaels moved up the rankings to sixth, but were unable to show why against U of T.

"A lot of our defensive problems were mental, we did not make the mental adjustments of how to play," said Coach Wilson, who was particularly upset that the defence allowed one and a half times its season average of points against.

The Gaels started the game well, leading by seven at half-time, but the flood gates opened in the second half with the visitors scoring 44 points and really turning it on in the last three minutes.

"It was definitely a hard loss, more emotionally because of the high we came off of on the weekend," said Gaels point guard Deanah Shelley.

While the team suffered from numerous defensive lapses, the 77 point output was the most of the season and did impress the coach and the crowd.

"Offence was not a problem. We moved the ball well, except that we were a little careless down the stretch," said Wilson.

The offensive outburst was

Yoga and the football team?

By TARA MANSBRIDGE

Perri van Rossem, a Queen's graduate and owner of the Kingston Yoga Centre, firmly believes that anyone can benefit from yoga. That is why she began giving yoga instruction to the Queen's football team yesterday.

van Rossem has developed a special program of Hatha yoga suited specifically to the physical and mental needs of these prominent Queen's athletes. Hatha yoga, one of seven main forms of yoga practiced today, is yoga which involves movement, exercise and breathing. Yoga itself is one of the six founding philosophies of Indian society, and has been in practice for more than 5,000 years.

Literally translated from sanskrit, the word yoga means "to yoke up" and van Rossem explains that the practice of yoga focuses on bringing the mind, body and spirit into harmony. Hatha yoga, which she instructs at the Centre and with groups such as the football team, "works on the understanding that you need to be wholly, fully in your body," van Rossem explained. "It's physical deep relaxation... which focuses on working with the breath."

van Rossem said that she hopes to de-mystify yoga for people living in the Kingston area. "[Yoga] isn't some strange movement or guru-ish kind of thing. It's about exercising your body, it's about relaxing and it's about feeling better generally. What's great about yoga is that it doesn't cost a lot of money. All you need to do is breathe."

By bringing the focus to the breath, Hatha yoga acts to better oxygenate the body. The postures of yoga create vibrations and, in conjunction with the better oxygenated blood flowing throughout the body, causes the release of muscle tensions. When you are able to let go of these blocked energies, said van Rossem, "the body begins to work like a generator."

"You are not tired after yoga," she explained, because the body has been reenergized and you have become more connected within yourself. "In

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Hot goalie Gaels' ticket to playoffs

Last season, the women's hockey team failed to make the playoffs partly because of poor goaltending. In response to this situation, six goaltenders were invited to training camp this fall and were allowed an equal opportunity to compete for the top job between the pipes. Claudia Tom, an 18-year old rookie from Richmond, British Columbia was named the number-one goalie and with her back-to-back shutouts against the University of Windsor (4-0, 3-0), she has been named both the Queen's Journal Athlete of the Week and the OUA Female Athlete of the Week.

The first-year Life Sciences student has been a goaltender since she was in grade nine. She was recruited by Co-Coach Di Drury over the phone last year in what has turned out to be a gem of a move. Co-Coach Jacques Tremblay describes Tom as being an "excellent skater, [who has a style] which is a combination of a stand-up goalie and a butterfly goalie." Tremblay has been coaching for 30 years and is very impressed with Tom's play.

The turning point for Tom, and for the entire team, was at the end of November when they embarked on a three-game exhibition road trip against American teams. While playing against Princeton, the Gaels lost 5-2 but Tom faced over 60 shots and proved that she, and the team, could hold their own against these upper level teams.

This year's Gaels are mostly rookies and this lack of experience would prove fatal for some teams, however, Tom feels that "it has worked out so far and we have a fairly good mix of players." This mix of players, if the season ended today, would make the playoffs for the first time in years. A huge piece of the playoff puzzle is the goalie that Tremblay says "might be the type of girl that could make the National team. Tom tries to extend her shutout streak at home this weekend with a pair of contests against Guelph.

led by Steph Glancey who scored 19 points on five of seven shooting from three point land. Wendy Moon, who was named MVP of the holiday tournament, potted 18 points despite a bad shoulder and Andrea Thomson, who caught fire in Waterloo, contributed 12 points in the U of T loss.

"We have to treat every game like a championship game."

— Gaels paint guard Deanah Shelley

The team is sure to fall in the national rankings and are now fourth in the division, but Coach Wilson is not too concerned.

"The league is so tough, no matter if the opposition is first or last, you can lose if you don't put the best on the floor and that is a concern," he said. "At the same time, I don't think there are any teams out there that we can't beat on a consistent basis."

Thomson, a fourth-year Phys-Ed student shared her coach's optimism. "All the mistakes we made [against U of T] were correctable, like foul shots and transition defence. [The mistakes] were all stuff we know that we can do right."

The one concern for Wilson and his squad is that the team has in the past done poorly this time of year.

"We traditionally don't play our best ball during mid-January to February," he explained. "We have looked into why that has happened with a sports psychologist and hopefully it won't happen this year."

The players from the team understand that this is a long season and it is time to re-focus and look towards starting their run to the OUA and CIAU Championships.

"Hills and valleys are part of the season and now we are going to concentrate on winning the league," said Shelley. "We have to treat every game like a championship game. When we are playing the top teams we get riled up and ready to play, so we have to treat every game that way."

Shelley and her mates will be testing that theory on the road this weekend when they take on Carleton and Ottawa, two of the division's weaker sisters.

Ravens grounded?

By ADAM KAMINSKY

The Carleton Ravens football program has grown accustomed to losing in the last 10 years, but the team suffered the ultimate loss last week when their athletic director, Drew Love, announced that the program is destined for the chopping block. It took one report with 12 recommendations for a program that has survived 53 years of football to be put to rest. The eagerly anticipated report, entitled The Future of Competitive Sport at Carleton, was written by Love and submitted to the Athletics Board and school President Richard Van Loon. While the most publicized casualty is football, the report's 12 recommendations dealt with the entire athletic department, outlining a new direction for the school's sporting community.

Under the new arrangement, the competitive sports structure will include four new divisions, which will encompass student competitive sport activities from elite external competition to internal recreational competition. This new structure will see a significant realignment of varsity and club teams, but the elimination of football will lead to the most savings and re-allocation for the athletic budget.

"There are 344 varsity athletes at Carleton and all will be impacted by these changes," said Love. "In order to remain competitive it was necessary to make these changes."

Queen's University Chair of Athletics and Recreation John McFarlane sympathizes with the plight of Carleton's athletic program.

"It is unfortunate that any university in Canada has to cut down athletic programs," he said. "I am sure that the powers that be have taken a long look and had to make some tough decisions and I respect them for that." While the elimination of funding from the athletic department is debilitating for the football team, the program has yet to be read its last rights. There is the possibility that if there is an overwhelming wave of public support and more than $200,000 in funds raised by February, the Ravens will fly again.

"This is sort of a crisis way of [raising money]," said Queen's Head Football Coach Bob Howes. "It takes more than one month to put together fundraising. That is why it seems like a shot gun thing."

Two similar scenarios have been played out during the nineties at University of Toronto and University of Alberta. In both cases the schools were able to raise enough money to save the teams.

If a 'white knight' does not rescue the Ravens program, it will effect the Gaels in the upcoming season.

"It will certainly change the scheduling for next season and it would probably squash the interlocking (regular season games between O-QIFC and OUA teams) system," said Howes.

On the whole, the loss of Carleton is viewed as a detriment to both the O-QIFC and the CIAU.

"I think it will hurt the league. CIAU sports are just starting to get more recognition and this kind of turn for the worse hurts," lamented Queen's quarterback Dustin Falscheet. "It is kind of sad when you look at US college football and see how the football teams support the rest of the athletic department and compare it to here, where football programs are shutting down."

With a history of futility on the football field, it would surely be the biggest victory in Ravens history to simply take the field next season.

Yoga to provide edge for Gaels

everything we do in life we need to breathe properly and most people do not breath properly."

"I'm really hoping that we can bring some more freedom of movement and an understanding of how [the mind, body and spirit] fit together," said van Rossem, of her involvement with the Golden Gaels. "The idea came because of my background, my father was a professional football player... and I am a competitive sailor. Yoga really improves strength, endurance and balance."

van Rossem approached Doug Hargreaves, former Gael football coach, with the idea of working with the football team in order to give them more of a competitive edge and, more importantly, to provide the team with a way of minimizing injuries and promoting the healing process among the players as part of their recovery program. When she saw that there was interest in the idea, van Rossem contacted two of the most important yoga practitioners in the United States, professionals who provide yoga instruction to the Philadelphia Eagles, Miami Dolphins and Chicago Bulls, for advice and information.

"I believe it will enable the players to understand what is happening in their bodies," van Rossem said. "Everyone has limitations, and I believe that through the yogic process we can help work through those limitations," she said.

Baseball

The Canadian Intercollegiate Baseball Association named Golden Gaels' slugger Chris Cartile their hitter of the year for the 1998 season at a league meeting last Saturday. Cartile, who also pitched, led the league with 8 HR and 28 RBI and finished third with a batting average of .574.

travelled to York University for the Excalibur Tournament and won the gold medal after defeating the University of Toronto 3-2 (15-11, 15-9, 8-15, 10-15, 16-14). The tournament MVP was Jake Magolan and Greg Stevenson was named to the tournament all-star team.

Men's Hockey

The men's hockey team lost both their contests last weekend against highly touted Ottawa (5-2) and McGill (4-2). The Gaels made many defensive mistakes which led to Ottawa goals. Queen's penalty killing was particularly suspect in the weekend defeats. This leaves Queen's winless in nine games.

Women's Hockey

After a twelve-hour bus ride to Windsor, the women's hockey team shook off any sluggish feelings and promptly defeated Windsor 4-0 and 3-0. Gaels' goaltender Claudia Tom recorded both shutouts and was named both the Journal Athlete of the Week and the OUA female Athlete of the Week. Scoring for Queen's were Kate Quigly, Katherine White, Jess Mullen (2), Andrea Millard, Lori Loftus and Kim Bjorkland. The Gaels' playoff run continues this weekend at home with a pair of games against Guelph.

Track and Field

Queen's track and field stars Shawn Brady and Bob McGill set a WORLD RECORD at the 100x1 mile relay at York University on December 20th. The record time was 7 hours 36 minutes, which was 15 minutes below the old record that was set in Texas.

Men's Basketball

The men's basketball team lost a nail-biter last weekend to the University of Toronto by a count of 62-61. Helping Queen's make the contest close were Derek Richardson (10 rebounds, 17 points) and Peter Stetler (9 rebounds, 14 points). The Gaels will hope to carry this strong effort into their next game.

Legs up for A Chorus Line

Students take musical off-Broadway to Princess Street

MUSICAL REVIEW

BY SARAH CROSBIE

It was only an audition, but the dancers and singers vying for a position in A Chorus Line were outstanding, as were the Queen's artists who portrayed them.

Presented by Queen's Musical Theatre and directed by Michael Payne, A Chorus Line, an award-winning Broadway musical, is a story of a diverse group of artists vying for a position in the chorus line of an upcoming show. Over the duration of the two-hour performance, the personal lives of each auditioning artist is exposed, allowing the audience to empathize with the characters' personal struggles and applaud their accomplishments.

Playing in the Grand Theatre's Regina Rosen Auditorium, the musical has a minimal set, using only the auditorium's bare stage and an elevated platform upstage. This simple and realistic set allows the talent of the performers to be highlighted, without complicated props or lighting effects distracting from the singing and dancing of the artists.

What truly makes A Chorus Line a performance to see is not the set, lighting, costumes or the script, but rather the raw talent of the 34 members of the chorus line.

The performances of the 19 main characters were exceptional because not only was each person suited to their role, both in physical appearance and demeanor, but throughout the performance, everyone stayed in character.

A Chorus Line performers prepare to kick it this weekend.

Highlights of the evening include a cute duet between Al, a typical born and raised New Yorker, played by Chris Bond, and Kristine, a girl whose got the moves, but not much else, played by Kate Ann Vandermeer.

Another great scene occurs between Zack, the director of the show who is auditioning everyone, played by Chris Mullins, and Cassie, an ex-lover and washed up actress who wants a part in the chorus line, played by Jill Connell. Both Mullins and Connell create an interesting sub-plot in the show, with Mullins deserving applause for playing a main character well, and demanding the audience's attention without actually spending much time on the stage. Connell also deserves praise for her excellent dance solo and strong style throughout the evening.

Other notable performances of the evening were by Daphne Moens, playing Sheila, a dancer who is nearing the end of the career without ever really succeeding, Patrick Brown who portrays Gregory, an overtly homosexual man and Evan Mochizaki who portrays Paul, a labouring, emotionally fragile artist who in the end may never accomplish his dream. The orchestra for the show also played well throughout the evening, always complementing the vocalists and rarely overpowering them.

The exceptional performance of the evening was by Jewelle Blackman who played Diana. Blackman performed two solo pieces in the musical, and her final number "What I Did for Love" was outstanding. Her vocal talent is comparable to any vocalist I've heard. Blackman has a rich and strong voice with a natural vibrato which commanded the audience's attention.

With the exception of a few minor technical problems in the performance, A Chorus Line was a fun and entertaining show. If you're going to go to one show this year, "She's the One."

A Chorus Line plays tonight and tomorrow night and January 20-23. Tickets are only $12 for students and seniors and $14 general, with all performances starting at 8 p.m.

New Radicals
Maybe You've Been Brainwashed Too
 MCA Records

BY JEFF CHILD

Well, there is nothing new or radical about the New Radicals debut album Maybe You've Been Brainwashed Too. The album consists of an awful collage of unmeshable styles. In one instance the group tries to recapture the Eighties ballad movement, while a few tracks later they are trying to mimic the guitar driven grunge of the nineties. It's almost as if the album's producer walked into the studio, handed out a collection of CDs by the Eagles and Smashing Pumpkins and said "copy these sounds to a tee and we'll have our album boys."

In reality, what you have is an unimaginative and unassuming debut album carried by one forgettable song.

is evident that the New Radicals have received hype and attention from their first single, but have they given us a worthwhile album to follow and enjoy?

Fuck no! If you think the New Radicals have produced an album littered with other enjoyable tracks, think again. Like others before them, this young band will have to rely on one song to carry them along until they get another chance to cut a new album.

Steve Martin
Comedy is not Pretty!
 Warner Bros.

BY SEAN SPRINGER

Equipped with a comedic arsenal that's loaded with the whimsical four-stringed banjo, the cut-in-check, stark-white suit and the confident, serious visage that declares "This is as silly as silly gets," Steve Martin is ready to release his comic genius and whisk the San Francisco night club, the Boarding House, off to the enchanted world of pure humour. It's 1979, and the comic — at the peak of his stand-up career — is proving himself as "The All Being" of professional show business, pushing all the right buttons and commanding an uncontrollable uproar of laughter from the audience.

Regardless if you've seen the home video in Homage to Steve

— a live performance of stand-up comedy — or listened to his previously re-released albums on CD Let's Get Small and A Wild and Crazy Guy, Martin's latest re-released masterpiece, Comedy is not Pretty! is a must for anyone who likes to liberate themselves with the rare giggle or even the odd chuckle.

Delivery is key in his performance, as Martin plays the sophisticated, yet clueless dimwit. He says, "You know a lot of people come to me, they say 'Steve, how can you be so fuckin' funny?'" It's a self-effacing farcical role: "We're recording some comedy jokes here tonight, and what we do is when we get this tape we're going to take it to Warner Bros. and we're going to erase it."

Turning to face the crowd, Martin slides the banjo out of his sheath and melts into the capricious two-minute tune "Drop Thumb Medley" — an intermission from the humour and an interwoven stitch in his set, which paces the show by breaking from the bombardment of dry humour and also transforms Martin from a "stand-up comic" into "a professional entertainer." Talented and diverse, the comic later reads "The Cruel Shoes," the funny, yet bloody title poem from his anthology of poetry.

Not only is it accessible to anyone who owns a CD player — or knows someone with a CD player, Comedy is not Pretty! is also a neatly packaged outlet for laughter. It goes out through the speakers, into your head and is guaranteed to tickle those inner pangs fervently seeking solace through the art of humour.

Six plays entice and entertain with variety

PLAY REVIEW

BY SARAH BAUMANN

On stage, a young woman screams in anguish as her painting comes to life. Fade to black. A man and woman dance in the spotlight for the first — and last — time. Fade to black. A woman is picked up in a restaurant — about 50 times. Fade to black. A terrified couple covers at their very own son, whom they believe to be a Nazi informer and you guessed it, fade to black.

For those of you who love the theatre, but want something with a little variety, be sure to check out 6 Short Plays at the Baby Grand Theatre running Thursday to Saturday of this week.

The first endeavour of the newly formed Gnu Ground Theatre Company, this performance has something for everyone. The brainchild of a spirited group of Queen's drama students, the show is comprised of six very short plays by authors ranging from Bertolt Brecht (The Informer) to the more local talent of Queen's undergraduate Jessica Eden (Jane Vanishing).

The idea is an intriguing one. Allow six student directors to choose and direct their own plays, while drawing on the talents of other company members and students to present an evening of entertainment. While the plays are all very different from each other, the mix is well balanced, and the whole show should run even more smoothly with transitional acts such as poetry reading and juggling.

Premise aside, the evening is made even more enjoyable by the fine acting in each of the six plays. It is difficult enough to create a believable character in a two-hour play, much less a play that is 15 to 20 minutes long, and these actors pull it off with style.

From the disturbed young artist in Jane Vanishing, portrayed by Harmony Trowbridge, to Cathy Griffin's dead-on impersonation of a stage manager from hell, almost every walk of life is explored in these plays.

I often found myself identifying with characters, or being reminded of people that I have encountered. In particular, Brad Douglas, as the multi-faceted Bill, and Steven Spencer, as an actor caught in a sort of green-room purgatory, provide some of the night's best moments in the plays Sure Thing and Fade to Black, respectively.

The intimate space of the Baby Grand is perfect for this production, as it allows the audience to be close to the action at all times. It also allowed set designer Jessica Eden to be very innovative with her designs. Token set pieces create the desired atmosphere without cluttering the tiny stage or wasting precious time in dismantling. For example, a candle creates the bohemian air of a café, while a picture of Hitler looms large in The Informer, set in wartime Germany. It is amazing how many places a 10 x 10-foot space can become, given the right props and a little imagination.

To summarize: go see this show. At $4 for students and $5 for everyone else, it's a better deal than any other show or film you're likely to find these days. And who knows? You just might learn something gnu.

Weed" comes to us three years later with the hopes of rallying more support and funding for NORML (National Organization of the Reform of Marijuana Laws). It lacks a few of the big names that the first album had, including the Black Crowes and Sublime, but it more than makes up for that with some strong and diverse lesser-known talent.

The addition of perennial tax evader Willie Nelson brought in the country contingent, with strong showings from Good Homes with "Long Haired Country Boy," Hank Flamingo's "The Dope Smokin' Song," and Dar Williams, who is lyrically brilliant on the folksy "Play the Greet."

Other highlights include Big Sugar's cover of Paul McCartney's "Let Me Roll It," and Gov't Mule's "30 Smokes in the Hole," which smokes the Humble Pie original, and reinforces their status as the most musically talented power trio since Cream.

The only real blemishes on the album are Letters to Cleo's "Let's Get High," which sounds like someone beating a cat to death to a shitty guitar line, and Spearhead's disgraceful, drum-looped cover of the Steve Miller Band's "The Joker."

There's no way this album is going to sell like the last one, but it's a much more interesting listen. Producer Gordie Johnson of Big Sugar puts together a good crop of talent on this CD, and it's a worthwhile purchase no matter how you feel about the cause.

Mediaeval Baebes Salva Nos Virgin Records

BY SARAH CROSBIE

Revealing dresses, exposed breasts, tarty attitudes, chamber choir music — one of these things is not like the others — unless you're describing the Mediaeval Baebes.

A group of 12 women, the Baebes have released Salva Nos, a 16-song album featuring solos, instrumental numbers and choir pieces.

At first glance, you might think the Baebes' release features sultry and sexy ballads or pop songs for your sexual pleasure longings. Along with their oxymoronic name, (in that Mediaeval implies something historic and 'baebe' has become a popular term in contemporary culture) the group's album jacket also contains a photo of each girl posing seductively, most often with either their hands or hair covering their bare breasts. Some would argue they appear crass utilizing the female body to gain commercial success.

Some would argue the Baebes appear crass utilizing the female body to gain commercial success.

If you can look past their name and appearance, then you will be pleasantly surprised. The Baebes' disc features full choir songs, as well as solo and instrumental pieces. Track nine, "An Adult Lullaby," is the earliest known lullaby from the 14th century and is a beautiful and melodic solo performance by Katharine Blake, who solos incredibly on eight of the tracks. Track 11, "Salva Nos" is an upbeat 13th century piece which is sure to have you tapping your feet, and track six, "So Treiben Wir Den Winter Aus" will offer you the illusion of participating in a medieval feast.

Most of the pieces on Salva Nos are performed in Latin, but for you music lovers who think it's the lyrics that make the music, the album jacket also contains the English translations.

You can look at the Baebes in one of two ways: you can scold them for using their sexuality to promote their music, or you can congratulate them for attempting a re-birth of chamber music into mainstream. Either way, it is difficult to dispute that Salva Nos is a great introduction to music from the 12th to 16th centuries.

What a piece of work is Shakespeare in Love

In love: Gwyneth Paltrow stars in Shakespeare in Love

MOVIE REVIEW

BY JESSE CRAIG BELLINGER

Shakespeare in Love, an astonishing hybrid of romance, comedy, wildly speculative biography and unbridled, unfettered Elizabethan theatre, is a triumph of the rarest kind: a film that could not be any finer. It should come as no surprise, then, to find Sir Tom Stoppard's name among the project's screenwriters.

Stoppard, the distinguished and magnificent British playwright, novelist and screenwriter, has not contributed an adaptation of Shakespeare to his already celebrated pantheon of theatrical output so much as he has constructed an essential addition to the Bard's categorically-loved works. Shakespeare in Love is, in all seriousness, a film that flirts with the greatness of Shakespeare's comedies in its ability to straddle high and low culture with equal veracity. Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them, writes Will in Twelfth Night. In Shakespeare, and still manages to elevate it to a magical level. In a film that possesses so much effortless artistry, Geoffrey Rush is certain to be overlooked despite his impeccable performance as Philip Henslowe, proprietor of the Rose theatre, as is Rupert Everett, who delivers an all-too-brief star turn as the famed Christopher Marlowe.

But no one lights up Shakespeare in Love as brilliantly as Joseph Fiennes, whom I will not demean by mentioning his relation to a certain older "english patient." While Fiennes has had an impressive theatrical career, which includes several seasons at the Royal Shakespeare Company, Shakespeare in Love is just his fourth appearance in a feature film (he co-stars in Elizabeth, which is currently in release). His portrayal of William Shakespeare, as well as his performance of Romeo within Shakespeare in Love itself, is touching, vital and about as far removed from the stuffy and inaccurate image of Shakespeare that has sadly been attached to both the man and his works in popular culture. Fiennes brings dignity as well as accessibility to a figure who is nothing less than an icon, playing the Bard as both a noble kinsman and fortune's fool.

A film that flirts with the greatness of Shakespeare's comedies in its ability to straddle high and low culture with equal veracity.

Screenplay and Shakespeare aside, a handful of inspired performances makes this film sizzle. The luminous Gwyneth Paltrow, in what is surely an Oscar-worthy performance, inherits a rich and arresting role

Blackwood, Sheridan and Andrew exhibit their work

By JOANNA SHARP

On Wednesday, January 13, which had to be the coldest day of the year, I summoned up the courage to visit the Edward Day Gallery and view a collection of some prominent artists that are being displayed this week. Three of the artists include David Blackwood, Maureen Sheridan and Simon Andrew.

This art exhibit was particularly interesting for those with little knowledge to the finer points of art analysis. The work is not too abstract and the talent that was needed to create these pieces is evident immediately. The works of Sheridan and Andrew were exceptionally strong.

His paintings were the type that you would love to see in your living room, just above the sofa.

A graduate of Queen's, Sheridan's pieces entitled "Breaking the Quiet," and "Right of Passage" were beautifully painted on fine acrylic canvases. The pieces, both depictions of nature, effortlessly created a mood of tranquility by emphasizing soft colours flowing into each other.

Sheridan's pieces entitled "Breaking the Quiet," and "Right of Passage" were beautifully painted.

Andrew's paintings were also really breathtaking. His four small works depicted abstract objects using strong colours that complimented one another. The objects were extremely evident and pronounced due to the colour choice, creating an environment for analysis. His paintings were the type that you would love to see in your living room, just above the sofa.

Not being an avid art enthusiast, I realize that there is more to appreciate in these pieces. However, these paintings were such that anyone could appreciate them, and, if anyone has the courage to trek through the weather, they are really worth seeing.

A Future Roadie discusses his under-appreciated role and importance in the music industry

By JOE SELLORS

The entertainment business is a constant battle for survival — having to step on the hands of friends and foes as one climbs upward on the ladder of prosperity. Success is and always has been the first and foremost object of desire for the bulk of performing artists. The motivation towards fame and money possesses many souls within the entertainment biz.

The one thing that has always overbearing my goodwill is the ignorance toward and within the profession.

And while this might be a well-documented aspect of the industry, the tribulations and conflicts of the people behind the scenes are rarely recognized. I'm referring, of course, to the life of the roadie/technician.

For years, I have witnessed and experienced events which contributed to the success of my role as a technician for the performing arts. And during all that time working as a volunteer and an employee for many companies and contracts, the one thing that has always overbearing my goodwill is the ignorance toward and within the profession.

Working with performers during the past few years, I feel as though I understand what they desire, and, most importantly, how they function. In my opinion, the majority of actors/actresses, dancers and singers, as well as the public, don't understand or care to comprehend exactly what a technician really does. The majority of the developed population possesses more knowledge concerning how to properly dress a hamburger than what a technician's job consists of.

Being fortunate enough to be in constant demand, the past years have kept me very busy. I have worked many rock 'n' roll gigs as a local crew member and though the money is bad, the sights and experiences are invaluable. These experiences range from A to Z, from Boston to day, I carried Korn's guitar equipment from their tour bus. That touring season I also had the opportunity to wash and then inflate Weird Al Yankovich's 30 foot tall blow-up figurine for an appearance on his "Bad Hair Day" tour. I also witnessed Iggy Pop's bellowing chubb crawling down his fake leathered pantleg, taking notice of the strange woman who kept following him around from his tour bus to the stage. The job in itself is damn hard work and the techie is the one that sweats his sack off in the middle of summer so the audience gets their money's worth. In the end, all I get is a shiny loony and little recognition.

Barry Manilow and back. Hopefully you can sense the sarcasm when I say that I loved spending half a day setting up a Hanson show and the other half a followspot operator for their pre-pubescent, hyperactive drummer Zac (Or Prozac, as we techies affectionately dubbed him). On the other hand, for the same shitty rate of pay, I assembled Orbital's keyboards and processors for Lollapalooza '97. The same public must acknowledge what is going on behind the scenes of a production in order to truly be awed by the performance. Hour after hour are put forth before an audience walks into an auditorium; whether it be an outdoor rock 'n' roll venue, or a large indoor theatre. Furthermore, months and even years are spent designing; this too is a task of a technician. On any given day I could be responsible for many tasks. While setting the environment in a concert venue, I could be doing jobs such as assembling and patching a 36-channel sound board, hanging state of the art intelligent moving light fixtures on a section of motor controlled truss which hangs 20-50 feet in the air, or making major adjustments to existing equipment. As a supervisor I must keep tabs on all my crew to make sure that they're meeting the standards of the contract, as well as enforcing discipline, proper work habits, and making sure everyone gets their required breaks.

In every profession there is always the possibility of conflict between crews, and technical production is no exception. The day that Colin James came to my venue last year was a prime example. From the information which was forwarded weeks before the show day, we felt as though we were prepared so only a small crew was assigned to the concert. James's management representative arrived and unleashed hell upon us. They wanted us to re-focus and put colour into all the lights, kinds of interesting people and actually hang with the talent. The truth is that we deal mostly with other technicians and band management, and actually stepping into a tour bus is grounds for immediate dismissal.

On a heavier note, the people and the performers must come to terms with the fact that this business is a 50-50 relationship whether they like it or not. Without technicians there would be no Rolling Stones, Radiohead, or Dave Matthews Band.

Please see Tech on next page

Technical difficulties

Without technicians there would be no Will Smith or John C. Holmes movies to see. On the other hand, forget that I just said that; I'm not even going to discuss the film and TV industry only because it is all the same story. I guess I can't say that I'm the reason Sheryl Crow is famous, but the fact is that without technicians, these very famous bands and individuals would be performing acoustically in a dark and boring stadium. Without technicians, there is no illusion.

include the essential management team (this group can get as high as 20 people holding separate titles).

In addition, don't forget about ushers, caterers, drivers, hospitality and venue maintenance. These services however, are included in the overall venue rental fee.

Let us all agree on one thing. The majority of the performing population are lucky, good-looking and/or well-spoken. The point that I'm trying to hit home is that very few famous performers go to school for their profession. In contrast, most technicians have to spend many years reading and attending school to perfect their trade. Don't get me wrong, there are many of roadies that never graduated from high school, but in today's competitive market, technical know-how is essential for success.

All I want is for the truth to be exposed and the public to be aware of what really happens behind the scenes of entertainment. But importantly however, I want people to know who's responsible for those happenings. So the next time you go and see your favourite band play, whether it be Hanson, Iggy Pop, or even Fred Penner, just remember who made the lights shine and the sound explode.

I can't say that I'm the reason Sheryl Crow is famous, but the fact is that without technicians, these very famous bands and individuals would be performing acoustically in a dark and boring stadium.

Let me ask you something. Where do you think all the ticket money goes for an individual show? If you said the majority goes to the artist performing on stage, you are sorely mistaken. The truth is, the actual artist gets very little from ticket sales. On a typical rock 'n' roll show, the money is distributed accordingly: 1) intelligent lighting, 2) sound rig, 3) set (if it is an average show) and finally 4) costume. The manpower required to set-up and strike a show of this type is surprisingly high. To be precise, the labour necessary to put up a show like Hanson, Iggy Pop, or Lollapalooza could be anywhere from 15 to 55 technical personnel; and these figures don't

The job in itself is damn hard work and the techie is the one who sweats his sack off in the middle of summer so the audience gets their money's worth.

A strange perception by the public is that a roadie or technician gets to meet all

Rage Against the Scene

WITH ACTS LIKE FATBOY SLIM AND LO-FIDELITY ALL-STARS, SKINT RECORDS BYPASSES THE ESTABLISHED CONSTRUCT FOR THE NEW MUSIC

By GREG DOLE

As far back as I can remember, music has continually found some new "scene" that is supposed to define the moment. Ask anyone about music in the 1960s and inevitably they will mention Woodstock or the Monterey Pop Festival. Many years ago, a foolish Globe and Mail newspaper commentator gushed about the up-and-coming music movement of the New Kids On the Block. Whether it be Electronic, Alternative Music, or even Alternative Country (not to be confused with New Country), when looking for new music today, there are countless "scenes" on offer.

[Fatboy Slim's] single "The Rockfeller Skank" is omnipresent. Every bar and radio station has played it to death.

pledged operation with 20 artists including Lo-Fidelity All-stars, Cut La Roc, Bassbin Twins, Hip Optimist and Bently Rhythm Ace, to name a few. As the accolades poured in, Harris set up distribution deals and the like with Sony Music, Astralwerks, and Parlophone. Somewhere along the line, when the marketing and promotions people came together to sell the music, Big Beat became the family name for deejayed music from Brighton, Skint Records, and Fatboy Slim.

The foundation of Skint is Fatboy Slim. His single "The Rockfeller Skank" is bits from all manner of artists. You may even recognize his album title from the Virginia Slims cigarette advertising campaign. Yet unlike the Sean "Puffy" Combs method of loop-his attention. He has received numerous remix offers from Madonna, U2, Aerosmith, and Meatloaf! So far, only the Beastie Boys have benefited from the Fat one's remix skills. Their recent video for the single "Body Movin'" is a Fatboy remix.

Along the same music inclination is the Skint Records group Lo-Fidelity All-stars. While they do have a bass player (who goes by the name of A One Man Crowd Called Gentle), the Lo-Fis are from the same school of creative sampling. The group stars a deejay named The Albino Priest, and an engineer named London, England's east end. Growing up in London, Singh also took great interest in The Jam, and breakdancing. Singh is clearly the product of diversity. For his album OK, he employed everything from the Madras Philharmonic Orchestra, to trumpets, flutes, guitars, and electric violins, to his own tabla-playing and programming machines.

Sure enough, Singh has been plagued by pundits trying to label and package his work.

According to Talvin, in India he wasn't considered "Indian," and in Britain he wasn't considered "British." As a result, Singh seems to suggest he is not concerned by boundaries or definitions. The music from OK shows no real category. He hasn't created pop music, he hasn't made classical Indian music, he hasn't made electronica, and he certainly hasn't made new age music. In short, I can tell you what it isn't, but I can't tell you what it is.

Sure enough, Singh has been plagued by pundits trying to label and package his work. British journalists were quick to call him the "Asian Underground." Upon further investigation, the Asian Underground is about as much of a music movement as the London Underground (subway system). Rather, this is a small group of musicians who have been influenced by some Asian traditions. As for the Asian Underground moniker, it is similar to the Big Beat Bootique; that is, just a name for Singh's weekly gig at a night club.

Like Skint Records projects Fatboy Slim and the Lo-Fidelity All-stars, Singh is taking modern music in new directions. The record label seems to signal the demise of standard rock 'n roll, moving instead toward artists who use technology creatively. In the end, it is all about people exploiting machines. And if this helps divert public attention from the Third Eye Blind's of this world, then we have good thing on our hands.

On Skint Row: Artists include Talvin Singh (top) and Fatboy Slim.

The Many Tentacles. Throw in the vocals of MC Wrekked Train, and you have a real-life mix of Beastie Boys and Fatboy Slim. However, there is no confusing the Fat one and the Lo-Fis. Whereas the former may give a glimpse into the future of pop music, the latter is definitely of the punk variety. The Lo-Fi's rant and induce a trance-like state at the same time. Someone told me they sound like "Portishead on crank [steroids]." While it is the high point of lameness to compare groups, this is fairly accurate.

These Skint Records projects share a common thread with the groundbreaking artist of the moment. A definitive example of an artist who defies description is Talvin Singh. Funny enough, he too has received numerous remix offers from Madonna. He is a classically trained tabla player, born in Punjab, India and raised in ing top-40 hits from the eighties, Fatboy takes samples of songs you wouldn't know. I mean, who has the aforementioned Sliced Tomatoes album? Nonetheless, Fatboy is making pop hits on his machines without ever playing an instrument, and musicians are lining up for
